Mr. MCADOO with Mr. HARMER.
Mr. COX with Mr. BAKER, of New York.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. WASHINGTON, on the French spoliation claims. Mr. O'FERRALL, if present, would vote "ay" and Mr. WASHINGTON would vote "no."

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, with Mr. DALZELL, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. DALZELL would vote for the claims, Mr. WILSON against them.

Mr. ABBOTT with Mr. HARMER, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. HARMER would vote for the appropriation, Mr. ABBOTT against it.

Mr. HARE with Mr. COLLINS, on the section of the deficiency bill in relation to French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. COLLINS would vote for the claims and Mr. HARE would vote "no."

Mr. LANDES with Mr. WHITE, of New York, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. WHITE, of New York, would vote for the claims, Mr. LANDES would vote against them.

Mr. HUDD with Mr. FITCH, on the French spoliation claims. Mr. HUDD would vote against the bill and Mr. FITCH for the bill.

Mr. COX with Mr. SPOONER, on the French spoliation clauses of deficiency bill. If present, Mr. SPOONER would vote for the appropriation, Mr. COX would vote against it.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. MACDONALD, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. GIBSON would vote for the claims, Mr. MACDONALD would vote against them.

Mr. ROGERS with Mr. SHAW, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. SHAW would vote for the claims, and Mr. ROGERS would vote against them.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, with Mr. DINGLEY, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. DINGLEY would vote for the claims, Mr. ANDERSON would vote against them.

Mr. LEE with Mr. PEEL, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. LEE would vote for the claims and Mr. PEEL against them.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, with Mr. BACON, on the French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. RUSSELL would vote for the claims, Mr. BACON would vote against them.

Mr. SOWDEN with Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE, until further notice, and also on French spoliation claims. If present, Mr. BROWNE would vote for these claims and Mr. SOWDEN would vote against them.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. MASON, on all questions except the French spoliation claims until further notice.

Mr. COTHRAN with Mr. LONG, for two weeks from August 9, 1888.

Mr. DOUGHERTY with Mr. STEPHENSON, for two weeks from August 20, 1888.

Mr. HARE with Mr. PLUMB, for three weeks from August 10, 1888.

Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. MCKINLEY, until Monday, August 27, 1888.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. ADAMS, until Tuesday next.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I notice that I am paired, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I voted. I notice that I am paired with Mr. COX, and I desire to have my vote canceled.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I notice that I am paired with Mr. GLOVER, of Missouri, and for that reason I withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the pairs of several gentlemen provide that members may still have the right to vote to make a quorum, and if gentlemen withdraw their votes no quorum has appeared.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] is here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri voted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will let my vote stand any way.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution requesting the President of the United States to return to the House the bill (H. R. 10060) prescribing the time for sales and for notice of sale of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes.

The message further announced that the Senate further insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, numbered 26, 27, 33, and 35, disagreement to which is insisted upon by the House, and agrees to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and the Senate insists upon the residue of amendments to said bill, and asks a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN as managers of the conference on the part of the Senate.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes. The pending question is on the appeal from the decision of the Chair taken by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE]. The Chair having ruled that section 4 of this bill, known as the French spoliation section, was out of order on this bill, the gentleman from South Carolina appealed from that decision, and the question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? Upon this question tellers have been ordered, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] will resume their places as tellers.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. On the simple demand for tellers is the question one on which members can vote who are paired with the right reserved to vote to make a quorum?

Mr. BURNES. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The question as to whether a member shall vote or not is one which rests with the individual member.

Mr. DIBBLE. Well, my parliamentary point is that this is simply an order for tellers and not a question of no quorum, because I have not made that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum has not been raised; but the vote will be taken anew, this being a new legislative day, and gentlemen who have already voted will please vote again.

Mr. CANNON. On the point that no quorum has voted the House is now dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. No one has made that point.

Mr. CANNON. But it is practically understood that that is the point.

Mr. DIBBLE. That is the very parliamentary question I was raising. So far as I am concerned, it is not practically understood that on this vote the point of no quorum is taken. This is simply a question of tellers, because the last vote of the House, the vote by which the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, disclosed a quorum. I do not see how anybody who is paired can vote on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a matter for the Chair to determine.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that this is a question of ordering tellers. Tellers have been ordered because the point of no quorum is made.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers have been appointed and the vote will be taken anew, and all gentlemen present are expected to vote on one side or the other. Those who are in favor of sustaining the decision of the Chair will now pass between the tellers.

The tellers took their places and proceeded with the count.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is announced I desire to state that I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURNETT] on the question of the French spoliation claims, and I therefore refrain from voting on this question. If I were free to vote, I should vote to sustain the Chair.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that I have voted to make a quorum.

Mr. BURNES. That is exactly what we need.

The tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 45.

Mr. DIBBLE and Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is made, and the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I voted in the negative. I wish to withdraw my vote.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. BLAND objected.

The count was resumed, and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 47.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the enforcement of clause 2 of Rule XXIII. We have been an hour trying to get a quorum, and I now insist upon the roll being called.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair requests that all gentlemen present who have not voted will vote.

The tellers again reported—ayes 94, noes 48.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is not a quorum, and I demand that clause 2 of Rule XXIII be enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, under the rule the Clerk will call the roll for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum be present in the committee.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Arnold,	Butterworth,	Darlington,	Greenman,
Atkinson,	Campbell, F., N. Y.	Davenport,	Guenther,
Barry,	Campbell, Ohio	Davidson, Ala.	Hare,

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration House bill No. 10896 (the general deficiency bill), had found itself without a quorum, whereupon the Chairman had caused the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER. The names of the absentees will be entered on the Journal. It appears from this roll-call that 168 members, being more than a quorum, are now present. The Committee of the Whole will, therefore, resume its sitting.

The House accordingly again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum having appeared, the tellers will resume their places. Gentlemen who have not heretofore voted will please pass between the tellers.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], who has been acting as one of the tellers, is at this moment absent from the Hall, and I suggest that the Chair designate another teller.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] will act as a teller in place of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]. Those gentlemen who have not already voted will please pass between the tellers.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, is this the same vote in which we have already been engaged?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the same vote. Those who have not heretofore voted during this day will please pass between the tellers.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I have voted twice heretofore, but I have not voted to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled, then, to vote.

The tellers continued the count.

The CHAIRMAN. If all gentlemen who desire to vote have done so the Chair will announce the result. [A pause.] On this question the ayes are 105, the noes 59. The ayes have it, and the decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to certain previous paragraphs of the bill with the view of offering some amendments which I think will meet the approbation of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to some paragraphs of this bill for the purpose of submitting amendments suggested by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let the amendments be first reported, so that we may know what they are. After our experience of the other day in allowing a return for some amendments while others were cut off, we want to know what is to be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments will be first read, after which the Chair will ask whether there be objection to returning to the previous parts of the bill for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I ask my colleague on the committee [Mr. BURNES] to recollect the agreement made the other day that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST] should have fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is reminded of the fact to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] calls attention, that at a previous sitting of the Committee of the Whole unanimous consent was given that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST] should be allowed to address the committee for fifteen minutes after the disposition of the question in regard to the point of order. That question having been now disposed of, the gentleman from Virginia is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. YOST resumed his remarks, begun on a previous day. The following is the entire speech:

Mr. YOST. Mr. Chairman, the measure to which I propose to allude may not be deemed pertinent to the bill now under consideration, but I regard it as of far more importance. It reaches to every section of this broad land and touches the hearthstone of millions of people. It penetrates to the center of our governmental system and directly affects the well being of every class of population and the future of the Republic itself. No subject before this House since the perilous days when the life of the nation hung in the balance has been so fraught with good for the masses, and none has received such outrageous treatment at the hands of those sworn to promote the public interest. State Legislatures have demanded its consideration; party platforms—district, State, and national—have pledged their candidates to its support; tens of thousands of names have been signed to petitions, the prayer of which was for action upon it, and a noble army of women have besieged the very halls of Congress in its behalf.

To these appeals a deaf ear has been turned; the pledges given have been wantonly violated, the promises have been broken, and the servants of the people have used the power with which they were invested to combat the wishes, the welfare, and the weal of those they assumed to represent.

This may be strong language, Mr. Chairman, and yet a review of the history of the Blair educational bill justifies every word of it.

With the details of that measure I do not propose to now deal. They are doubtless familiar to every man within the sound of my voice. They have been discussed from nearly every hustings of this land; months have been spent in their consideration by the other branch of Congress, and for the past six years the public prints have teemed with comments upon them.

Suffice it to say that the bill provides for the expenditure of $77,000,000 for the education of the masses. To the South it gives over two-thirds of that amount. The share of the State I have the honor to in part represent would alone be $5,310,000. Why this unequal distribution? Because the apportionment is made on the basis of illiteracy. Where the greatest need for the money is there the largest amount shall go. Paradoxical as it may seem, the very breadth of its nationality renders it sectional. It applies the remedy locally, but the whole system is to feel the beneficial effects.

Under these conditions one would naturally suppose the Representatives from the Southern States would eagerly press for consideration of and action upon a measure which promised so much of good to their constituencies, and that the party dominated and controlled by those Representatives would employ every means in its power and every influence at its command to lift the Southern people to a higher plane of intellectual life, and gladden and brighten the thousands of homes now darkened by the cruel shadow of ignorance.

As true and faithful Representatives, it seems to me, that was their bounden duty. How they performed that duty let the record show.

The original bill providing for the establishment of and temporary aid to public schools by the National Government was introduced in a Republican Senate on the 6th of December, 1881. Its patron was a Northern Republican, whose name has since been associated with the measure and has become a household word throughout the Southern States. It was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, a majority of whom were Republicans, and by that committee favorably reported. No further action was taken upon it in the Forty-seventh Congress.

The day after the Forty-eighth Congress assembled, December 5, 1883, Senator BLAIR again introduced the bill, and it was properly referred, and a second time favorably reported. After a protracted debate it passed the Senate on the 7th of April, 1884, by a vote of 33 to 11. Of the 33 who voted for it 20 were Republicans, namely, Messrs. Blair, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conger, Cullom, Dawes, Dolph, Edmunds, Frye, Harrison, Hoar, Logan, McMillan, Manderson, Miller of New York, Morrill, Pike, Platt, Riddleberger, Sawyer, and Wilson; and 13 were Democrats, namely, Messrs. Brown, Call, Colquitt, Garland, George, Hampton, Jackson, Jonas, Jones of Florida, Kenna, Pugh, Ransom, and Williams. Of the 11 who voted against it 9 were Democrats, namely, Messrs. Bayard, Butler, Coke, Groome, Harris, Maxey, Morgan, Pendleton, and Saulsbury; and only 2 were Republicans, namely, Messrs. Hawley and Miller of California.

It went to a House that was Democratic by eighty-odd majority. Meantime a bill precisely similar had been introduced in the House by Mr. Willis, of Kentucky, a Democrat, but a sincere and earnest friend of popular education. It was referred to the Committee on Education, of which Mr. Willis was a member, and favorably reported. But no action was ever taken by the House. Twice Mr. Willis sought to have a day set apart for the purpose of consideration, and twice did a Southern Democrat enter an effective objection. On the 3d of March, 1884, unanimous consent was asked, and Mr. BLAND, of Missouri, was the objector. On the 1st of April following, consent was again asked and another Southern Democrat (Mr. John Randolph Tucker, of Virginia) rose in his seat and said, "I object." That ended all prospect for the passage of the bill in the Forty-eighth Congress.

The Presidential election followed. The national Democratic platform declared against the bill in the following terms:

> We are opposed to all propositions which upon any pretext would convert the General Government into a machine for collecting taxes to be distributed among the States or the citizens thereof.

There was but one proposition before the country which contemplated a distribution from the public Treasury to the States, and that was a proposition which had for its object the spread of intelligence throughout the Union, and a lifting of the South from the slough of ignorance into which she had been plunged and from which she was striving so heroically to escape.

In broad contrast with this declaration was the utterance of the Republican platform. It declared in favor of—

> A wise and judicious system of general education by adequate appropriation from the national revenues wherever the same is needed.

Wherever there is a child to educate let the money go. Wherever darkness prevails let the light shine. It mattered not that four-fifths of the money was to be contributed by the North, because of its greater wealth, and that the Republican party represented essentially that portion of the Union. It mattered not that over two-thirds of the total sum was to be expended in the section which contributed but one-fifth. It mattered not that the Democratic party counted with absolute certainty on the electoral vote of a solid South, and protested against the acceptance of this splendid donation. These considerations did not enter into the deliberations of the Republican party. It saw the nation's pressing need; it saw the nation's peril. A solemn duty lay before it, and grandly it marched to the performance thereof. [Applause.]

But by the vote of that solid South it was deprived of the power to make good its pledges.

A Democratic President was elected and a Democratic majority controlled the House, the Senate continuing Republican.

The Forty-ninth Congress met. During the first session the Senate again passed the Blair bill (March 5, 1886), and this time by an increased majority, the vote being 36 ayes to 11 nays. Of the 36 affirmative votes 20 were Republicans, namely, Messrs. Blair, Bowen, Conger, Cullom, Dolph, Evarts, Hoar, Logan, Mahone, Manderson, Miller of New York, Mitchell of Oregon, Morrill, Palmer, Riddleberger, Sawyer, Spooner, Teller, Van Wyck, Wilson of Iowa; and 16 were Democrats, namely, Messrs. Berry, Blackburn, Call, Colquitt, Eustis, George, Gibson, Jackson, Jones of Arkansas, Kenna, Payne, Pugh, Ransom, Vance, Voorhees, Walthall. Of the 11 negative votes, 6 were Democrats, namely, Messrs. Cockrell, Coke, Gray, Harris, Maxey, Wilson of Maryland; and 5 were Republicans, namely, Messrs. Frye, Hale, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, and Plumb. Nine pairs were announced. Of the Senators paired and who would have voted for the bill seven were Republicans, namely, Messrs. Dawes, Edmunds, Harrison, McMillan, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Pike, and Stanford; and 2 Democrats, Messrs. Brown, and Hampton. Of the Senators paired and who would have voted against the bill 5 were Democrats, namely, Messrs. Morgan, Beck, Butler, Vest, and Saulsbury; and 4 were Republicans, namely, Messrs. Chace, Platt, Hawley, and Sewell.

Counting the pairs the bill passed by a vote of 45 to 20. Of the affirmative vote 27 were Republicans and 18 Democrats; of the negative vote 11 were Democrats and 9 Republicans.

It went to a House Democratic by 43 majority. It was referred to the Committee on Education, a majority of whom were Democrats, and so bitterly hostile to the bill that they refused to act upon it at all, endeavoring thus to stifle it and deprive the people's representatives of even the privilege of consideration. In this they were successful. But its friends did not yield without a struggle. On the 29th of March Mr. Willis introduced a House bill, the words of which were identical with the Senate bill, and moved that it be referrred to the Committee on Labor, hoping, doubtless, that those who had been designated to specially guard the interests of the working classes would eagerly avail of an opportunity to render signal service to every laboring man in the broad limits of the Union. Opposition to this reference at once sprung up, its enemies recognizing the motion as in the interest of the measure, and that its purpose was to present the issue squarely before the representatives of the people and let them decide as to its merits.

The vote upon the motion to refer was regarded as a test of friendship for the bill. The motion was carried—138 yeas to 112 nays. Of the affirmative vote 71 were Republicans and 67 were Democrats. Of the negative vote 88 were Democrats and only 24 Republicans. Of the entire Republican vote 75 per cent. favored the reference, and therefore the bill; and 25 per cent. opposed it. Of the entire Democratic vote 43 per cent. favored the bill and 57 per cent. opposed it.

It went to the Committee on Labor, but that committee was also composed of a majority of Democrats loyal to the party creed.

They refused, as had the Committee on Education, to report the bill back for action by the House, but in its stead presented a substitute which eliminated every feature of the bill worth preserving and effectually killed it. The substitute proposed to render problematical the fund from which the appropriation was to be made by providing that it should be derived from the proceeds of the sale of public lands, and it robbed the bill of its very germ and essence by providing that the distribution should be made on the basis of population and not on the basis of illiteracy. The design of the Blair bill was to aid the poor and the ignorant—to provide the means for a leveling up of the plane of intelligence by placing the money where it was most needed. [Applause.] The Crain substitute simply perpetuated the inequality; but its real design was to defeat all legislation that looked to the uplifting of the working classes, and in this it was successful, for it barred all hope of the Blair bill becoming a law in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The minority of the committee—the Republican members of the committee—reported as a substitute for the committee's substitute the Blair bill.

Mr. YOST. Yes, sir; I should have mentioned that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The Blair bill as a Senate measure was never before our committee. The bill referred to the Committee on Labor was the bill introduced by the then representative from Kentucky, Mr. Willis.

Mr. YOST. Which was precisely similar in terms to the Blair bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. But the Senate bill itself was referred to the Committee on Education.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am referring to the substantial provisions of the measure, not to the particular document.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am referring to the bill itself.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am speaking of the principle.

Mr. YOST. The bill of Mr. Willis was precisely similar to the Blair bill. Mr. Willis so stated at the time he introduced it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And we so understood it.

Mr. YOST. A year ago, Mr. Chairman, I sat as a spectator in the Virginia Democratic State convention held at Roanoke. One of the principal speakers was a Democrat of national reputation—a man whom his own people had delighted to honor—who had been a member of the Forty-ninth Congress and from this Hall passed to the other end of the Capitol to take his seat as a United States Senator. Before that large assembly of representative Democrats of the Old Dominion, Senator DANIEL spoke with that power and eloquence for which he is noted, and which never fails to win enthusiastic applause. The scene and the warmth of welcome extended seemed to arouse him to an extraordinary effort. He dwelt with force and fervor upon the issues of the canvass, the prospects of the party, and the blessings that would follow its continued ascendency in the State. He then entered upon a review of the work of the Forty-ninth Congress, claiming that with all of its shortcomings it had enacted much important legislation; such as the interstate-commerce law, the oleomargarine bill, and other measures in which the public interests were involved.

And last came his reference to the Blair educational bill. Why, said he, was it not passed? Let us follow the advice of our great leader—'tell the truth.' The truth is that the bill was defeated by JOHN G. CARLISLE. As Speaker of the House he appointed the Committee on Education and so constituted it that no report should come from it, and all action on the Blair bill would thus be stifled. So hostile, said the Senator, to the interests of my people did I regard this action of JOHN G. CARLISLE upon this most important of all subjects to them, that at the close of the session, I, as a Representative of Virginia, could not and did not vote for the resolution of thanks to the Speaker, which it is customary to pass when the term of a Congress ends.

A thousand others besides myself heard this statement, and the number included reporters of various newspapers. In its report of that part of the speech the Richmond Dispatch, the organ of the Democratic party in the State of Virginia, said:

Some say, Well you did not pass the Blair bill. I, said the Senator, will follow Grover Cleveland's advice, who says, "Speak the truth." The reason the bill was not passed was because JOHN G. CARLISLE defeated it.

The New York Times, another good Democratic authority, in its report said:

He also laid to Speaker CARLISLE the defeat of the Blair educational bill, a course which led Mr. DANIEL to refuse, as he said, to join in a vote of thanks to the Speaker.

Senator DANIEL is a manly, straightforward man, who generally says what he believes, and is ready to assume responsibility for what he says. He will not deny the statement here attributed to him. Ask him if he said it, and I doubt not his reply will be: "I not only said it but I meant every word of it." He was earnest enough in its utterance to mean every word of it, and as the declaration fell from his lips the very building trembled with the thunder of applause. Shortly afterwards the following, among other resolutions, was unanimously adopted by the convention:

We earnestly advocate liberal appropriations by the Federal Government out of the national revenue in aid of the education of the children of the several States in proportion to illiteracy, in accordance with the provisions of the Blair bill, or some better measure.

Here, then, was the admission of Democrats—ay, their declaration—that the Blair bill had been deliberately defeated by the Speaker of their choice. Upon him they sought to load the sins of the party, to make of him the scrapegoat to bear away the burden of their iniquities.

The Fiftieth Congress met. The Republican Senate for a third time passed the bill. The vote was taken on the 16th of February of the present year, and stood—ayes 39, nays 29. Of the 39 voting in the affirmative 23 were Republicans, namely: Messrs. Allison, Blair, Bowen, Cameron, Chandler, Cullom, Dawes, Dolph, Evarts, Hoar, Manderson, Mitchell, Morrill, Palmer, Platt, Quay, Riddleberger, Sawyer, Stanford, Stewart, Stockbridge, Teller, Wilson of Iowa; and 16 were Democrats, namely: Messrs. Berry, Brown, Call, Colquitt, Daniel, Eustis, George, Hampton, Hearst, Jones of Arkansas, Pasco, Payne, Pugh, Ransom, Vance, and Walthall.

Of the negative vote 17 were Democrats, namely, Messrs. Bate, Beck, Blackburn, Blodgett, Butler, Coke, Faulkner, Gray, Harris, Kenna, Morgan, Reagan, Saulsbury, Turpie, Vest, Voorhees, and Wilson of Maryland; and 12 were Republicans, namely, Messrs. Aldrich, Dawes, Farwell, Frye, Hale, Hawley, Hiscock, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Plumb, Sabin, and Spooner.

Four pairs were announced. Of those who would have voted in the affirmative 3 were Republicans, namely, Messrs. Edmunds, Paddock, and Sherman; and 1 was a Democrat, Mr. Gibson. Of the four who would have voted against the bill 3 were Democrats, namely, Messrs. Cockrell, Gorman, and McPherson, and 1 was a Republican, Mr. Chace. Counting pairs the vote stood—ayes 43, of whom 26 were Republicans and 17 Democrats; nays—33, of whom 20 were Democrats and 13 Republicans.

The bill for a third time went to a Democratic House—a House Democratic by 15 majority. Here it encountered its old, implacable enemy. With the knowledge of what his course had been; with the knowledge of an opposition so uncompromising that it refused to allow this great demand of the people to be even heard; with the knowledge of a hostility to the interests of Virginia and the interests of the South, so pronounced that a leading member of his own party refused to unite in the complimentary resolution which is generally adopted without a dissenting voice from either side of the House; with a full knowedge of all of this, Mr. CARLISLE, by the acclamative vote of the Democratic caucus, including the representatives of that party from Virginia, was renominated as Speaker, and when the time came, with the same unanimity, was invested again with the power which a leading Democrat, speaking to Democrats, openly charged had been used to defeat the wish and the will of the people. To him was committed the selection and appointment of the committees—the power to almost absolutely control legislation—certainly to stifle and strangle any measure which it was desirable should never have an opportunity to test its strength before the House. [Applause.]

The Committee on Education was appointed. It consisted of eight Democrats and five Republicans. In the early days of the session bills similar to or identical with the Blair bill were introduced in the House by Republicans. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROWER] was the patron of one; I presented another, and perhaps others still of a like character were introduced. They were referred to the Committee on Education and promptly buried there. With a view to the resurrection of one of these measures (and they were all practically the same), an effort was made to force its consideration. On the 7th of February the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], a Republican and earnest friend of the Blair bill, submitted the following proposed amendment to the rules:

Resolved, That Rule XXVII, clause 1, be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Whenever application in writing, signed by a majority of the members of the House, shall be presented to the Speaker requesting him to recognize any member therein named to move a suspension of the rules and pass a bill, to be named by him, upon the first Monday of the next ensuing month, it shall be the duty of the Speaker to recognize the member so named in such written request, upon the said first Monday of the next ensuing month, and when more than one such written request is presented in any one month, the members therein named shall be recognized in the order in which they are presented to the Speaker."

The object of that resolution was to secure consideration of the Blair bill. Had it been adopted it was proposed to test the strength of the measure by the circulation of a petition designating some member for recognition who would move the passage of the bill, and thus bring it up upon its merits. Mark you, the resolution provided that this recognition should not be accorded unless a majority of the members attached their names to the petition—that majority which is supposed to control the action of the House and to be the law-making power. Could anything be fairer? Could anything be more reflective of the popular sentiment as indicated in the election of the Representatives? Could anything be juster to the people in a Republic where the will of the majority is the sovereign law? And yet, sir, no action was taken on that resolution. It was referred to the Committee on Rules, a majority of the members of which were Democrats, and there it slept the sleep of death.

A similar fate awaited resolutions which were subsequently offered by members of the Republican side of the House, among whom were the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROWER] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. T. H. B. BROWNE]. These resolutions were designed to relieve the Committee on Education from the further consideration of the bill, and set aside a day for its consideration by the House. They were, as expressed by another, "chloroformed" in the Committee on Rules. If the Committee on Education was the sepulcher of all legislation relating to education, then the Committee on Rules might well have been designated as the ante-chamber to the tomb. Nothing in the shape of aid to the spread of intelligence ever escaped from either. [Laughter.]

Meantime the Blair bill had been passed by the Senate, sent to the House, and referred to the Education Committee. By consent of the members introducing them, the House bills were laid aside, in order that the Senate bill might be considered. That bill was referred to a subcommittee composed of a majority of Democrats. That majority, after consideration, reported in favor of a substitute for the bill similar to the substitute reported by the Labor Committee in the Forty-ninth Congress and known as the Crain substitute. The minority of the subcommittee, composed of two Republicans, submitted a minority report favoring the passage of the bill as it came from the Senate. These two reports came before the whole committee. That committee, as I stated, was composed of eight Democrats and five Republicans. It required seven to make a quorum—two in addition to all of the Republican members.

For weeks and months efforts were made to secure consideration by the committee, but a quorum could not be obtained. At length, however, the two reports from the subcommittee came up, and an unimportant amendment was agreed upon. It was hoped then that action would be had, as only one other step remained to be taken. As the end drew near, however, the difficulty of securing a quorum increased. The regular day of meeting came and went with each succeeding week, but time after time the old story of no quorum was repeated. Finally the necessary seven were secured—five Republicans and two Democrats—the bill was taken up and a Republican [Mr. O'DONNELL] demanded the previous question on agreeing to a report. The crucial moment had arrived, but just as the motion for the previous question was about to be put a Democratic member of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] left the room, broke the quorum, and ended all further proceedings for the time being.

Again, after long and tedious waiting and repeated meetings, the necessary number to constitute a quorum was secured, and for the second time the previous question was demanded by Mr. O'DONNELL. When the chairman was about to submit the motion, a Democratic member, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], was called out, the quorum broken before a vote could be reached, and the bill effectually strangled.

Upon each of these occasions the Republican members of the committee were present and ready and anxious to press for action. To the last meeting one of the Republican members was summoned by telegram from a distant State, so important was his presence regarded. He promptly responded, only to have the quorum broken just as its work was about to be completed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST] be allowed ten minutes more to conclude his remarks.

Mr. BLAND. I hope so. This being, as I suppose, the funeral of the "Blair bill," I want to see it decently buried.

Mr. YOST. I know the gentleman would like to see it buried, but it will not be buried.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman has been arraigning the Democratic party. I am glad that party has a record of some economy in defeating the "Blair bill."

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia have leave to print the residue of his remarks.

Mr. YOST. I hope I shall be allowed at least two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Virginia be allowed ten minutes additional. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. YOST. I thank the committee for its indulgence.

From that day to this no quorum has ever been gotten together, and of course no report has been made. Nor is there hope for any action during the life of this Congress, for the Democratic members of the committee know that as soon as a legal meeting of the committee is held just so soon will the Republican members demand a report on the Blair bill. That is what a majority do not intend to have, no matter what may be the demand of the people, no matter how great the need for action, no matter what injustice may be perpetrated by their course.

In making this statement, Mr. Chairman, I divulge no secrets of the committee and violate no rule of the House. I am not in the confidence of the committee and therefore could not betray that confidence. Nor do the statements here made rest upon information derived by me from any member of the committee. They are matters of common report, spread to the world through the public prints. I state them as facts which I believe to be true, and so charge, and I challenge the members of the committee here present, and whom I now see, to deny them if they can be denied. I pause for a reply.

As I expected, there is and can be no denial.

If in the statements I have made the slightest injustice has been done to either men or parties, I am more than willing to make the correction when the error is pointed out. I want every friend of the bill, no matter with which party he affiliates, to have full credit for all he has done in its behalf. And I want every enemy of the bill to have courage enough to assume the responsibility for his opposition, and let the people know who it is that thus defies their wishes.

But, sir, let me go a step further, for the record does not end here. In May last the Republican caucus of this House unanimously indorsed the Blair bill and demanded its consideration. A month later the Republican national convention incorporated in its platform a ringing declaration in its behalf. This plank of the platform was suggested by one of the warmest friends of the bill—General WARNER, of Missouri. It is a literal quotation from the celebrated Des Moines speech of that grandest of Republicans, Ulysses S. Grant. [Applause.] The principle involved is one that ought to be dear to the heart of every lover of the Union, and clothed as it is in the language of the nation's greatest defender, it comes to us as the expression of the party's creed and purpose, emphasized and impressed by him who knew so well the true meaning of Republicanism. [Applause.] Here is the declaration of the Chicago platform:

> In a Republic like ours, where the citizen is the sovereign and the official the servant, where no power is exercised except by the will of the people, it is important that the sovereign—the people—should possess intelligence. The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us as a free nation. Therefore the State or nation, or both combined, should support free institutions of learning sufficient to offer to every child growing up in the land opportunity of good common-school education.

And where stands the Democratic party on this question of education? We look in vain to its platform for any expression upon this most vital of all subjects. Not one word did it utter in behalf of free education, not a whisper did it vouchsafe. Its only reference to the public school was an indorsement of the Democratic platform of 1884, in which, as I have shown, the principle of the Blair bill was condemned. And when and where in his four years of office has President Cleveland spoken in favor of the public school?

And yet this is the party that claims, without the count, the vote of a solid South. Is there no need for education in that section?

Turn to the pages of the last census and mark the tale there told.

The total population of the United States in 1880 was 50,155,783. The whole number of persons, white and colored, in the sixteen Southern States was, in round numbers, 18,500,000. The whole number in the twenty-two Northern States was 31,600,000. Of the Southern population 6,000,000 are blacks; 3,000,000 of whom, or 50 per cent., can not write. But the illiteracy is not confined to the blacks. There are in the United States 2,949,147 illiterate whites, of whom 1,676,939, or nearly 57 per cent., are in the Southern States. The South has about one-fourth of the white population of the States, and over one-half of all the white illiterates, and these added to the millions of blacks who can not read and write make up one-fourth of the entire aggregate population in the Southern States. Is there no need for public education there?

Naturally our white population is as capable of instruction, as quick witted and bright as any people on the globe. But the poorer classes are ignorant simply because they never had a chance to learn. Before the Republican party took the reins of government there was no such thing as a free school in the South, and the man who was too poor to pay for the education of his child saw it grow up in abject ignorance. In Virginia, it is true, he might have sent his child to school under certain conditions, but what were the conditions? If he were too poor to pay he must go before a notary and make oath that he was a pauper. Then the child was admitted to the school and a tuition fee was paid from the county fund.

But few availed of this generous provision of the law, for the child, if it had one drop of manhood or womanhood blood in its veins, would rather have lived and died in ignorance than to have been subjected day after day to the humiliation of being pointed to as a pauper. But the law also provided that no freeholder could claim to be a pauper, and every owner of land was a freeholder. The mountaineer who owned the little cabin, perched on an arid, rocky acre, saw his children cut off from every hope of improvement. He had no money with which to send them to school, and being a freeholder could not avail of the other provision of the law. And so generation succeeded generation and the shadow of ignorance, like a dark cloud, enveloped them all. Do you wonder, then, that the proportion of white illiterates is so great in the South?

But you say we have had the free-school system for twenty years. That is true, and our people have made heroic efforts to render the system effective. But they have not the money. Virginia, especially, was swept by the simoom of war. Her fields were laid waste, her homes made desolate, and the flower of her manhood was laid beneath the sod. She furnished the camping-ground for both armies. I can best describe her condition, so far as it relates to schools, by reading two of a series of letters which I received some months ago from the superintendents of the counties in my district. The picture they present is a faithful photograph of the country schools of the South and shows the pressing need for aid, and aid at once.

I read, first, a letter from William C. Corson, county superintendent of the public schools of Cumberland County, Virginia, dated January 16, 1888, addressed to me. He says:

> DEAR SIR: Your communication of the 5th January to hand. With much pleasure I now proceed to answer the interrogatories therein contained in reference to the public schools of my county.
> First. Total school population, according to the census of 1880, 4,121; white, 1,053; colored, 3,068.
> Second. Total enrollment, session of 1886-'87, 1,889; white, 685; colored, 1,204.
> Third. Total average daily attendance, 1,051; white, 456; colored, 595.
> Fourth. Length of school session, 5.02 months.
> Fifth. Cost per pupil enrolled, $4.68 per session.
> Sixth. Cost per pupil in average attendance, $8.41 per session.
> Seventh. Condition of school-houses: About one-half of our school-houses are comfortable and well furnished; the others, cheap log buildings, poorly lighted, and in every way unsuited for the purpose. We greatly need more and better houses, but are unable to build with our present means.
> Eighth. Salaries of teachers: Teachers are paid from $20 to $30, according to the grade of superintendent's certificates held by the teacher. It is difficult to secure competent, efficient teachers for the meager pay we can offer. The short five months' session I regard the most objectionable feature of our public-school system.

Ninth. Improvements demanded: More and better school-houses, with good furniture, longer sessions, an increase of teachers' pay, and means to furnish indigent pupils with text-books. The Blair bill would give us the money to remedy all these defects and enable us to make our public schools what they should be—the pride and glory of our land. I rejoice to know that you are among the friends of the bill, and you may rest assured that your constituents in this county will, to a man, help to hold up your hands whilst battling to gain this great boon for your State and your country. The public schools are the only hope for the education of the children of the people, and an earnest zeal in behalf of this great cause is, to my mind, the strongest evidence of true patriotism. Virginia is doing all she can to educate her children, but it would require double the amount annually appropriated to meet the pressing needs of her public schools.

A very small per cent. of our white people are able to educate their children in private schools, and such schools are entirely out of the question among the colored race. The education of the negroes is greatly retarded on account of the extreme poverty of this race; the parents are too poor to buy the necessary text-books for their children. Often in visiting the colored schools I find from three to half a dozen pupils trying to prepare their lessons from one book. The public funds are so limited that the district boards do not feel warranted to expend more than a few dollars each year to furnish books to indigent pupils. The name of every member of the Fiftieth Congress who works and votes for the Blair educational bill will be honored in Virginia and his memory will be cherished and revered to the latest generations. Allow me to thank you in behalf of the people of Cumberland for the interest which you manifest in the cause of public education.

Very respectfully,

WM. C. CORSON.

I have a letter from G. E. Caskie, superintendent of public schools for Nelson County, Virginia. Mr. Caskie writes as follows:

LOVINGSTON, VA., January 9, 1888.

SIR: Yours of the 5th instant received. In answering the interrogatories therein propounded I will use the figures shown by my annual report for the school year ending July 31, 1887. I do this because I suppose it would be fairer than to take any one month of the present session as the basis of my answers.

First. The school population of this county is, according to the last census, 1885: White, 3,594; colored, 3,185; total, 6,779.

Second. The enrollment for last session was: White, 2,151; colored, 1,660; total, 3,811.

Third. The average daily attendance during the same period was: Whites, 1,157; colored, 704; total, 1,861.

Fourth. The length of the school session is five months. There are three schools in the county which run six months; all the others run only five months, except such as are closed sooner because of failure to make the required average, or some reason of that sort. The average last year was just five months.

Fifth. The cost of the whole system (including all expenses—my salary and everything) last year was 59 cents per month per pupil enrolled, or $2.95 for the session per pupil enrolled.

Sixth. The cost for last session, including everything, was $1.21 per month per pupil in average daily attendance, or $6.05 for the session per pupil in average daily attendance.

Seventh. There are now in this county ninety schools, of which about twenty-five houses belong to the school board; the residue are cabins, log houses, etc., which the people let us have. Of the twenty-five which we own, about eight are good houses; the others are mostly log, about two-thirds of which are hewed logs and the others just built of round poles. Of those furnished by the patrons about the same proportion of hewed and round-log buildings exist. With the exception of the eight mentioned above, all of these houses are in bad repair, some much more so than others. Some are hardly fit to be occupied at all. Last year I was forced to condemn some, and if I did my duty I would condemn others now. Some of them have board roofs, held on with logs or rocks; some others have sliding windows—i. e., plank windows without any glass—and when you open the window to let in the light you leave a hole. In many of these houses the chinking is knocked out and the teacher has to daub it up with mud as best he can.

I think I may safely say that all the furniture we have, including desks, benches, tables, chairs, etc., for the ninety schools, is not worth over $90. The benches usually, in fact with very few exceptions, have no backs, and in many instances are made by splitting a log in two and boring holes in which legs are put, thus making two benches. With the exception of a very few schools, a few of these benches, a small blackboard, and a plank nailed to the side of a house for a writing desk, constitute the furniture. There is not a map, globe, chart, or anything of that sort in a single school in the county.

Eighth. Our teachers are paid according to the grade of certificate they hold—first grade, $30 per month; second grade, $25; third grade, $20. The average salary last year was $23.74. Owing to the lack of funds, the trustees often prefer a third to a first grade teacher, because they are cheaper. Of course this injures the schools very much.

Ninth. To cover the county and provide school facilities to all of the people we need about fifteen or sixteen more schools. The country is so broken and mountainous that it requires a larger number of schools than if it were more level. Our aim now is to so locate the schools that no person will be over 2 miles from a school. Yet in many cases they are 3 miles, and in some instances 3½ or 4 miles. In bad weather these latter persons are practically debarred of all school privileges, and irregular attendance makes the school but little benefit to the scholar, and the scholar a disadvantage to the school. We need houses fearfully, and where we have them we need to repair them. We need school apparatus, maps, globes, charts, etc. We should run the schools for at least two months longer each year, and in the small towns and villages, where the children are not compelled to work, the schools should be run for nine months.

Owing to scarcity of funds we are unable to pay the school trustees any salary. Hence they can not give the time and attention to the duties of their office which is necessary for the proper performance of those duties; and of course the county superintendents are badly paid. They should be able to give their whole time to the schools.

Hoping that your efforts in behalf of the "Blair bill" may be successful,

I remain, yours respectfully,

G. E. CASKIE.

Hon. J. YOST, Washington, D. C.

I have received from other counties of the district similar letters, all telling a tale that ought to touch the nation's heart.

And yet, strange irony of fate, this in the State that gave away an empire and stipulated in the grant that one-sixteenth part of it all should be dedicated to educational purposes. Millions and tens of millions are annually paid to public schools from Virginia's splendid gift, and yet when her own children ask for a tithe of a tithe of her great largess, for the crumbs, as it were, that fall from the sumptuous table her bounty has provided, the request falls upon ears that will not hear. [Applause.]

They who refuse and again refuse to stretch forth the strong arm of the National Government and lift this people into light are assuming a fearful responsibility the consequences of which they must face. You vote millions every year to an army and a navy to protect the nation's interests and uphold the flag, yet not a cent to those who when the real peril of the future comes must bare their breasts to the storm of shot and shell in the nation's defense. [Applause.] Millions more are expended in the construction of ironclads and the erection of fortifications against an enemy that will never come, whilst all unheeded the very foundations of the Republic are being sapped and at the door of millions of households the deadliest foe to peace and happiness stalks in and takes possession. [Applause.]

Tens of millions are devoted to rivers and harbors that commerce may be promoted, but not a dime to stay this seething tide of ignorance that darkens the land and year after year grows in intensity and volume. [Applause.] What excuse can you give for this wanton, shameful neglect of an interest overshadowing in its proportions and which reaches into every fastness of the mountain and all the valleys that lie between? Will you tell them again that the Speaker is alone responsible and then return and re-elect that Speaker without a dissenting voice? [Applause.] Unlettered and credulous these people may be, but once deceived they do not forget the deceiver. They know now that education is the rule and not the exception; they know that he who wins in the battle of life must be panoplied for the fray; that their children must be armored with intelligence ere they can hope to contend with the children of the North and West.

From the embrace of that environment which for generations has held them with chains of iron, they are slowly it may be, but none the less surely, emerging. And he who seeks to perpetuate their old condition will reckon without his host. A spark of hope has been kindled in their breasts by the promise of the Blair bill—by the promise that the children to come after them shall not inherit their pitiable lot. They see the dawning of a new day for them and theirs, and by its first glintings they recognize their true friends, and recognize, too, those who blinded them with passion and prejudice and led them like sheep to the slaughter.

The light that spreads intelligence throughout the South dissolves its solidarity. [Applause.] And therein lies the only explanation I can give of the hostility of Democratic politicians—not the people—to public education. They know that intelligence begets independence in thought and action; that independence elevates manhood and womanhood; that it suggests comparison of condition and inspires the ambition to reach to higher things; that it scorns the bondage of passion and prejudice, and, looking to material betterment, demands the right to strike a blow in its own behalf.

And knowing this the representatives of national Democracy plant themselves athwart the pathway of the public school. They refuse to accept the $58,000,000 offered to the children of the poor throughout the South, and say to them, Live and die in ignorance as your fathers did, for then, and only then, this latter-day Democracy can live. [Great applause.]

Mr. WISE. Mr Chairman, I ask unanimous consent of the House that I may occupy this floor just as long as the gentleman has if I choose to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to occupy the same length of time occupied by his colleague.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope it will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, when I entered the Hall this morning it certainly was with no intention of making a speech on the Blair bill before the end of the day. It did not occur to me that when a bill making appropriations for deficiencies is under consideration it was the proper time for the discussion of an educational bill, unless I should be actuated by the same purpose which animated my colleague to make up for his own deficiencies. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] If I chose to go into his record I might appeal to it to know what he has done for Virginia, either on the subject of education or in any other direction. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

We all understand the purpose proposed to be accomplished by the speech just delivered. The gentleman's opponent is in the field and it becomes necessary for him to deliver on this floor a political speech to be used in the campaign. I thank God that the people of Virginia are not so ignorant as to accept a dodge like that for his deficiencies in his services to them as their Representative. [Laughter.]

I do not propose on this occasion to address myself to the merits of the Blair bill. It is known to the members of the House that I am in favor of it. It is also known to the members of the House that my people are in favor of it. When I came to this House in 1880 the Republican party was in a majority in every branch of the Government. Warren J. Keifer, of Ohio, occupied that chair, and this House was Republican by a clear majority. The Senate, too, was Republican by a clear majority. Yes, the President of the United States was a Republican.

Mr. PAYSON. By a large majority. [Laughter.]

Mr. WISE. I repeat they were in a majority in every branch of this Government. The Blair bill was then before the Senate. The Blair bill was then before the House. Did they pass it? No. Why not? Because they lied when they said they wanted it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

They had an opportunity to pass it. They had, I repeat, an opportunity to pass it, but did not; and their failure to do so is confirmation of the assertion that their claim of being in favor of it is false. The gentleman from Virginia just now arraigned the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] for reporting a bill to the House during the Forty-ninth Congress for the distribution of the public money in aid of education on the basis of population. Why, he has forgotten the record of his own leaders. It was John A. Logan, the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency in 1884, who offered that amendment in the Senate to the Blair bill, and on the floor of the Senate championed it, declaring that he was not in favor of taxing his people to pay for ignorance in the South on the basis of illiteracy. Let him take that home to Virginia with him. [Laughter and applause.] His own candidate for the Vice-Presidency was the first man who wanted the distribution of the money from the public Treasury in aid of education on the basis of population. And why is the gentleman from Virginia in favor of it at present? He has told you the reason: because he gets so much money. [Laughter.] It is a question of dollars and cents with him and nothing more; it is not a question of principle. [Renewed laughter.]

During the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress Hon. John A. Logan, then a Senator from the State of Illinois, said:

Why, sir, the proposition I made first in 1882 was that $50,000,000 be appropriated out of the revenues of the United States and distributed according to the population in the States and Territories for the benefit of the illiterate children of the whole country. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 76, page 1993.)

If the gentleman will turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session Forty-seventh Congress, volume 52, page 1950, he will find that Mr. Logan, in explaining his bill, said:

Let us therefore first examine the bill carefully in order that we may understand clearly its provisions. These are simple, and, so far as the wording is concerned, easily understood. The first section provides that from and after the passage of the act the entire income derived from the internal-revenue taxes on the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits shall be appropriated and expended for the education of all the children living in the United States. The second section provides for the method of distributing this revenue, as follows: That the money so received shall be distributed to the several States and Territories according to the population as shown by the census of 1880 and each succeeding census, for the purpose of being applied by such States and Territories solely for the purposes of education as in this bill provided for.

In his reference to the substitute for the Blair bill reported by the Committee on Labor of this House during the Forty-ninth Congress, the gentleman from Virginia said:

It proposed to render problematical the fund from which the appropriation was to be made by providing that it should be derived from the proceeds of the sale of public land, and it robbed the bill of its very germ and essence by providing that the distribution should be made on the basis of population and not on the basis of illiteracy.

The only difference between the substitute which he has characterized with much severity and the proposition offered by Mr. Logan is that the former proposed the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands and the latter the revenues derived from the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits in aid of education.

Mr. Logan's proposition was to continue that odious system of taxation known as the internal revenue, and to make the distribution on the basis of population, by which the lion's share would have been secured to his own State.

In the Forty-eighth Congress the Blair bill was before the Senate again, and then Mahone, of Virginia, was a Senator. Thank God, he is not now. [Renewed laughter.] Mahone, of Virginia, was there. I have the vote here in my hand to show what was done; and when that vote was taken in the Forty-eighth Congress Mahone voted how? Ah, Mr. Chairman, Mahone is reported absent. [Renewed laughter.] He was not paired. We asked him in Virginia, "Why is it that you were absent on this important occasion, when the RECORD shows that you were there both the day before and the day after?" He endeavored to dodge the question. There is no other word to describe it. [Renewed laughter.] He tried to get out of it, and the other Republican Senator from Virginia, one H. H. RIDDLEBERGER, came before the public and testified that Mahone was absent because he was opposed to the bill. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And that is your leader. [Laughter.] You want to educate the ignorant people of Virginia and you are following a man—your "boss"—who, when he had an opportunity to vote for the bill, on the testimony of one of Virginia's Senators, dodged the issue. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, I heard two gentlemen just now on the other side of this House, on the Republican side, Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, applauding Mr. YOST. I have the record here on them. Let us see how it stands. In the Forty-ninth Congress that bill, that Senate bill, was referred to the Committee on Education. Mr. Willis, of Kentucky, not a Republican but a Southern Democrat, called for a conference of the friends of the Blair bill, and I was one of that number. We discussed the matter, and agreed that the proper method of procedure was to take the Blair bill as it passed the Senate and introduce it again, and on the day of its reintroduction to make a motion to refer it to the Committee on Labor. That is the way that it got to the Labor Committee. Go tell the people of Virginia that her Representatives here—not you—[laughter] allied with a gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Willis, had it referred to the Committee on Labor. My friend from North Carolina here, Mr. COWLES, was with us, and my friends, Mr. JOHNSTON and Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, were also with us.

I find upon page 2882, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 77, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, that a vote was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Willis, to refer the Blair bill to the Committee on Labor. What do we find there? Every Democratic member of this House from Virginia voted in favor of its reference to that committee. Let me read their names: Barbour, Cabell, Croxton, Trigg, and WISE. Five in all. All the Democrats.

I want to do justice all around. Mr. Brady, a Republican of Virginia, but not a follower of the "Boss," was with us. [Laughter.] The vote was taken on the question of reference, and my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] voted against it. My honorable friend from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM D. KELLEY, voted against it.

Mr. KELLEY. Against what? I have not been hearing what the gentleman said.

Mr. WISE. You voted against referring the Blair bill to the Committee on Labor.

Mr. KELLEY. Oh, that I may have done.

Mr. WISE. Oh, yes; you may have done it. [Laughter.] Now just hold on one moment. Of course you did it. I have got you right here. [Laughter.] I want my honorable friend from Pennsylvania to understand that I never make a statement unless I know it to be true, and then I will swear by and stick to it until death. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Why not pass the Blair bill now, if the gentleman and his friends will aid us——

Mr. WISE. You just wait; you are just consuming my time.

Mr. HISCOCK, a Senator from New York now, voted against it. I suppose you gentlemen will say you did not oppose the reference of the Blair bill to the Committee on Labor with the purpose of defeating it. And yet there could have been no other motive. All the opponents of national aid to education voted in the negative. But I have got Mr. HISCOCK tight. Let us see.

Mr. GALLINGER. Permit me to correct my friend——

Mr. WISE. No, sir; just keep your seat now. [Laughter.] The Blair bill——

Mr. GALLINGER. But I was on the conference, and I want to state to the gentleman a fact that he has overlooked.

Mr. WISE. You have been talking all this session. [Laughter.] I have heard so much of you that I want to hear no more. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LAIRD. I suppose that is intended for a compliment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, just let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WISE. I do not want your questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well· I will take my own time.

Mr. WISE. The Blair bill, Mr. Chairman—and I want this to go down to Virginia—the Blair bill passed the Senate on the 15th day of February, 1888. What was the vote? I have the record of that vote here, and it may be interesting to gentlemen. Let us examine it. I will read the names of the Democrats who voted for it: Mr. BERRY, Mr. BROWN, Mr. CALL, Mr. COLQUITT, Mr. DANIEL, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. HAMPTON, Mr. HEARST, Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Mr. PASCO, Mr. PAYNE, Mr. PUGH, Mr. RANSOM, Mr. VANCE, Mr. WALTHALL.

Mr. YOST. How many against it? Seventeen against it.

Mr. WISE. Republicans voted against it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Give us their names.

Mr. WISE. I am going to read them. I am going to read the names of those that were not in favor of it, now: ALDRICH, DAVIS, FARWELL—Mr. CANNON, your Senator; FRYE—Blaine's Senator; HALE—the other Senator of Mr. Blaine; HAWLEY, a prominent candidate for the Republican nomination at the Chicago convention; HISCOCK, the very man that helped to kill it here, gone to the Senate and has voted directly against it; INGALLS, who, we are all told, in case of a war with Great Britain is going to command the forces of the country [great laughter and applause]——

Mr. LAIRD. What becomes of Cleveland? Is INGALLS going as his substitute?

Mr. WISE. JONES, of Nevada; PLUMB, of Kansas; SABIN, of Minnesota, and SPOONER, of Wisconsin.

Mr. DAVIS. How many voted for it?

Mr. WISE. Sixteen Democrats, and 15 Republicans against it.

Mr. DAVIS. How many Republicans voted for it?

Mr. WISE. Now, Mr. Chairman, in all honor and fairness, do you not think it is audacity to have the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST] come here, hard pressed in his canvass, and, in order that he may have ammunition, with this record staring him in the face, endeavor to make a party question of the Blair bill? I do profess that I would not be guilty of a lie; and I believe the man who practices a fraud is guilty of a lie. I would not be guilty of a lie for my seat here. I would not hold it, if I were capable of perpetrating a lie. I want to make no false impression. I do not want it to go forth to my people that all Democrats are in favor of the Blair bill. I know they are not; neither are the Republicans. This is not a party question.

The man who attempts to make it a party question is either in a state of ignorance or worse. He is willing to sacrifice the cause for a political, party purpose. I was once prosecutor in my district, and of all crimes in the catalogue I hated that of false pretense worse than any other. To the bold, brave highwayman, who would come and demand your purse, you might give some portion of your admiration for his courage. But the small man and the sneak-thief who filches money by false pretenses excites your disgust. Mr. Chairman, I like the bold, brave, manly——

A MEMBER. Highwayman.

Mr. WISE. Statesman, who honestly follows his principles anywhere and everywhere, and who would scorn to profit by a false impression. I thank the House kindly for its attention [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURNES. I call for the reading of the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST] has asked recognition, and the Chair will hear him.

Mr. YOST. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing—— [Cries of "Regular order!"] Oh, yes; call for the regular order if you want. I am perfectly willing to have this question put to a test here and now, and see whether or not it is a Republican measure, and whether the Republicans favor it. This House can do anything by unanimous consent, and I ask unanimous consent that the Blair bill be taken up now, and no man on the Republican side is going to object. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The Speaker rapped to order and demanded that the members take their seats.

During the confusion a colloquy continued between Mr. COWLES, of North Carolina, and Mr. YOST, which could not be heard by the Reporter.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent to return to different portions of the bill for the purpose of offering amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] asks unanimous consent to return to different portions of the bill for the purpose of offering amendments. The Chair will cause the amendments to be read, and then submit the question as to whether unanimous consent will be given. The Chair again requests members of the committee to resume their seats and to stop conversation.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I understand that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] says Republicans were opposed to the Blair bill. I want to ask now—— [Cries of "Regular order!"] I have a question to ask now, and I am going to ask it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman, but he will confine his statement to the question.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. The question is whether unanimous consent can now be given to vote upon the Blair bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that the House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering an appropriation bill and can not proceed to the consideration of another matter.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Would it be in order to go out of Committee of the Whole for that purpose? If it is, then I move that the Committee of the Whole rise so as to vote on this question.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the amendments may now be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the bill the following:
"Lines 14 to 25, inclusive, on page 2; lines 1 to 8, inclusive, on page 3, and lines 11 to 15, inclusive, on page 7."

Mr. BURNES. I beg to offer this explanation to the committee. The parts that we propose to strike out of this bill have been taken care of in the sundry civil bill in conference, so that it is simply to strike them out of this bill in consequence of that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to this amendment at this time?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I think I shall have to object, Mr. Chairman, unless the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] will consent that after this is disposed of the committee will rise, in order that unanimous consent may be given for the passage of the Blair bill. [Murmurs of dissent on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I withdraw the objection if the gentleman will not agree to my proposition. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]?

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I now offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

"To pay Charles L. Sauer, for services rendered as assistant enrolling clerk during the last session of the Forty-ninth Congress, $20."

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I also offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In lieu of the amendment inserted on page 32, after line 15, insert:
"Support of prisoners: For support of United States prisoners, including necessary clothing and medical aid, and transportation to place of conviction, being for the service of the fiscal year 1887, $25,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNES. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the only object of this amendment is to remedy a defect in a provision which is now in the bill and has been passed upon by the committee. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. COTHRAN] submitted an amendment which was incorporated in the bill, but we have thought that the language of the amendment which has just been read would probably be more effective. It is intended to accomplish the same object as the existing provision. There is no change in the amount and no change in the purpose, and therefore I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to the amendment, but I want to be heard upon it for a few minutes.

Mr. BURNES. Of course the gentleman can not be heard unless he is going to object to the amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. Why not?

Mr. BURNES. If the gentleman objects let him signify his objection, and I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not object. I merely want to reply to a certain point which was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] the other day.

Mr. BURNES. I withdraw the amendment, and I now move that the committee rise and report this bill to the House.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to strike out the last section of the bill.

Mr. BURNES. The last section has been already passed.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. The gentleman can not be heard except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOOKER. My object is to correct a statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] in a speech which he made the other day when I was absent.

Mr. BURNES. You will have a chance to do that on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HOOKER. I want to do it on this bill.

Mr. BURNES. I insist upon my motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to know whether it is not in order for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to offer an amendment in addition to the present text of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has not offered any amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But is it not in order for him to do so?

The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman submits an amendment, the Chair will determine whether it is in order or not.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] asks unanimous consent to submit an amendment to the bill. The amendment will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

Mr. HOOKER. Do I understand the Chair to state that that amendment will not be debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not before the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] asks unanimous consent to offer it.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] has moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House. Does not that motion cut off all these proceedings?

The CHAIRMAN. Pending that motion, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLAND. Well, I demand the regular order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I simply desire to say that this amendment which I now propose is one which concerns the whole House. It is for the relief of a man who has been its faithful servant for years. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], who has charge of this bill, knows the merits of the proposition——

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask that the amendment may at least be read, by the courtesy of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], so as to admit it to the RECORD.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. I claim that the point of order which was ruled upon by the Chair was ruled upon the first paragraph of the section.

Mr. BURNES. No, sir; it was upon all.

Mr. DIBBLE. Let me get through with my point of order, if you please. I claim that it could not have been ruled on any more than that portion of the section, because the rest of it never has been read to the House. The reading stopped with that paragraph.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish the House to understand distinctly that I do not raise this question of order for the purpose of repeating on the remaining paragraphs of the bill the struggle we have already had, for I accept the decision of the House in the vote which was taken as final in reference to the whole section. But as a point of order I submit that the regular order when demanded is the reading of the remainder of the bill for the purpose of allowing the same point of order to be repeated, and this will give my friend from Mississippi the opportunity to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] when the point of order was made stated distinctly to the committee that he made the point of order upon the whole section and upon every paragraph in the section. The Chair in ruling stated that the point of order was sustained as to every paragraph in the section, which ruled out the whole of it; and in that way the whole section has been disposed of.

Mr. DIBBLE. The point I make is that if the regular order were strictly carried out the rest of the section would have to be read in order that the ruling should apply to it. The reading was never waived. I insisted on the reading of the first section, and the rest was not read. The reading has never been waived. Therefore I think the gentleman from Mississippi is in order in offering an amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for making the point of order was before the consideration under the five-minute rule and after the general debate. The reading of the bill under the order of general debate was waived by unanimous consent, which was a waiving of that reading to which the gentleman from South Carolina refers. It was in order when the section was reached for the gentleman from Missouri to make a point of order with reference to the whole section, which was done, and the point of order sustained. The gentleman from Missouri now moves that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. CHEADLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Can a motion to strike out a section of a bill prevail before the section is read?

The CHAIRMAN. No motion was made to strike out; the section was stricken out on a point of order.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Missouri by adding "and that the chairman be instructed to report to the House that the committee have not considered the fourth section, it having been ruled out of order by the Chairman, whose decision was sustained by the committee." I move this as an amendment in order that the fact may be reported to the House.

Mr. NELSON. I submit that that motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order. The only question before the committee is on the motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. DAVIS. As evidence that this motion is in order, I would refer the Chair to the Digest of Rules and Practice of the House, pages 312 and 316:

> The Speaker can not rule in regard to what occurred in Committee of the Whole unless it be reported by the Chairman under instruction from said committee. (Page 312.)
> It has become the well-settled practice of the House that the Speaker can not rule upon a question decided or pending in the Committee of the Whole House unless it be reported by the Chairman of the committee. (Page 316.)

The motion which I submit embraces a fact of which I desire the House to have official knowledge, in order that the Speaker may rule upon the question which may then be presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided the question of order; and therefore it is now too late to ask that the question be referred to the House. The decision having been made by the Chair and sustained by the committee, there is nothing to report to the House, because the consideration of the question has been concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. But it is on a motion to rise and report the bill to the House that I offer this amendment, so that when the committee rises this fact may be stated to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If, pending the consideration of this bill, and before the point of order had been disposed of by the committee, the gentleman had moved that the committee rise and report the question to the House for its opinion, the Chair might have held that proposition in order. But now the Committee of the Whole has disposed of the question, and it is not before the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I simply desire to have reported to the House the fact of the action of the Committee of the Whole, just as the House will report upon the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the bill has been considered by the committee and a certain conclusion arrived at. I wish the entire facts to go before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can make no report except that the committee, having considered the bill, has directed him to report it back with amendments, which has been the customary report heretofore. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CANNON. I care nothing especially about this question; but the Committee of the Whole having had referred to it the deficiency bill for consideration and report to the House, and the bill having been considered, and a portion of it having gone out upon a point of order, it looks to me as if when the bill is about to be reported back to the House, it is competent for a majority of the committee to report to the House how the bill was disposed of.

1. Was it amended, and if so, what were the amendments?

2. Were certain portions stricken out on points of order, and if so, what portions? Then, of course, when the House has possession of all of the action of the committee it is competent to take such action as it may desire. But if it is reported back to the House with a statement as to how the section was disposed of on the point of order the House would have no power, I take it, to consider that portion of the bill which goes out on the point of order in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The practice has been when parts of a bill are ruled out on a point of order not to report them back to the House.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order, and it is in reference to the point made by the gentleman on the other side of the House. I would like to know when a bill has been reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole by the chairman in charge of it whether he is to make any report in regard to the amendments which have been adopted in the committee? As a matter of course these amendments, as the action of the committee, are a portion of the report of the gentleman having the bill in charge. When he comes to make his report is he not constrained to say that by a point of order sustained by himself as chairman of the committee the fourth section of the bill, which embraced the French spoliation claims, has been stricken out? Will that not necessarily have to be reported as part of the action of the committee?

I think, therefore, the point made by the gentleman on the other side of the House is the correct one, and that in making the report the House should be instructed by the committee as to what the committee has done. In such case when the committee reports to the House the House will understand it. The House may agree with amendments or disagree without amendments. If they add to it or take from it in the Committee of the Whole, when they add to it or take from it it is a matter to come up before the House for the action of the House, as the amendments offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] to this bill necessarily come up for action in the House, and they are to be voted on in the House.

If that be so, then every action of the committee has to be reported, because the committee acts as an ordinary committee and reports for the consideration of the House, and when the House receives the report of the gentleman having it in charge, it can adopt or reject it, or adopt it in part and reject it in part. Therefore, I take it, the point of order made by the gentleman on the other side is correct.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Chair has ruled on this question several times, and I should like to know if there is any way in which it can be finally disposed of.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask whether there is objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It is to amend the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that the committee now rise and report the bill favorably to the House. I move to add the words, "and report to the House the fourth section of the bill, which has been ruled out on a point of order, with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report it back in ten days."

Mr. Chairman, I apprehend the Committee of the Whole has precisely the same powers as any other committee of the House; that it is not the House, but a committee of the House, simply different from other committees in being composed of all the members of the House.

It was instructed by the House to consider a certain bill and a certain section in it, which section itself set out certain claims which had been by order of the House referred to the Committee on Appropriations with direction to be reported back, and which were reported back by that committee in obedience to that order. Now, this committee which the House ordered, the Committee on Appropriations, to report these claims back, and having reported them back, as it was ordered to do, and they having been embraced in the fourth section of the pending deficiency bill, it seems to me when the Committee of the Whole strikes out that section on a point of order, that it is in order for the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in reporting its action to the House to report any recommendation pertaining to this bill which it may please to do. It can report it with amendments. It can report it back with a substitute. It can report it with a recommendation that section 4 shall be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report it back within ten days. Otherwise the committee is superior to the House. It is arrogating to itself the duty of refusing to consider what the House ordered the Committee on Appropriations to return to this House and what the House committed to this Committee of the Whole for consideration.

Personally I have no feeling one way or the other as to whether these particular claims go in or not. I have performed what I regarded as a public duty as to the claims, and as to the merits I have nothing more to add; but I think, in view of precedents already established and the precedent about to be established now, that it is a matter which merits a good deal more serious consideration than gentlemen appear to give it, and have therefore suggested a motion which returns the claims to the House for its action.

Mr. BLAND. It seems to me that would be an attempt to reverse the action of the committee already taken.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In that the gentleman is wholly mistaken. It is precisely as if the gentleman's Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, with a bill referred to it by the House, should report the bill back with certain sections in it with the recommendation that it be passed and with certain other sections that it considered not within its jurisdiction and asked to have those sections referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Who would say that it was improper for the House to reverse the action of his committee? It is in precise accordance with the action of the Committee of the Whole in the present instance. The Chairman of the committee has decided here, and the committee has approved the decision, that this section is not a proper section for this bill. That is the present status. To meet that what are we to do?

I have draughted this motion in accordance with and obedience to that decision. Instead of reversing the action of the committee, I submit to it, and all that I do is simply to present to the committee a resolution which refers the matter committed to it back to the House with a certain recommendation. We report back to the House what we say we have not jurisdiction over. We report back what we say is not properly in this bill. We report to the House what we have done in connection with this matter, and then go a step further and recommend to the House to do what it did on last December; that is, to recommit this particular section to the same committee, to wit, the Committee on Appropriations, to which it then committed it, with instructions to report the subject-matter back in a separate bill in order that it may be considered by the House. For, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, otherwise the precedent which will be established is one which the House ought to be careful about. Here are claims, whether honest or not, which the House in the Forty-eighth Congress ordered to be sent to the Court of Claims for an ascertainment of the facts. That court has acted upon them, and they are returned to this Congress. By order of this Congress they are sent to a certain committee. For seven months the Speaker of this House, as the organ of the House, has referred to that committee under the continuing order of the House these various claims as they came from the court. That committee in obedience to that order of December, and in obedience to these recurring orders of the Speaker as the organ of the House, reports the claims to the House for consideration.

They are not only reported to the House, but they are reported by a committee of which nine of its members make an argument against them without raising any point of order. The House commits the bill with the section in question to the Committee of the Whole. Days are spent in discussing the bill——

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question just there?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. As soon as I complete the sentence.

And after days of discussion suddenly it is discovered that after all that order was null and void; that the Speaker of the House, and I say it with the greatest respect, acted as the organ of the House with curious ignorance of parliamentary law; that his action all these months had not been legal, and that it was simply an act of nugatory usurpation to refer these claims to the committee; and now at the end of nine months' session these claims, having been sent back by the court and thus treated, are entirely cut out by an order of the Committee of the Whole, not because they were unmeritorious, but because after the House itself had ordered a mode of hearing, considering, and determining them that mode turned out to be no hearing at all. Now, all that leaves a flavor and discloses a method regarding the treatment of claims which ought not to surround our action in regard to them, whether they be just or not.

The motion I make simply takes the vexed question and returns it to the House and recommits it to the committee, and furnishes an opportunity to say whether it will yet carry out the order of last December and consider these claims.

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa for his question.

Mr. WEAVER. I understand the motion of the gentleman to be this: to have a report made to the House in regard to the section stricken out; that the claims therein embodied be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In a separate bill.

Mr. WEAVER. Yes. Now, I want to say this——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEAVER. That the section stricken out is not in the bill or before the House, and that it can not be recommitted. Nor can a separate section of a particular bill be recommitted, for it is not a bill, nor the subject of recommittal. You can recommit the whole bill, but not a part of it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In response to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that upon the point of order which has been made the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. Permit me to say a word in addition to the point very properly made by the gentleman from Iowa before the ruling of the Chair: That the section not being in the bill, it is not subject to any action by the committee at this time. If it were a subject for action by the committee at this time, the committee could not take the course indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky, for the reason that it has been already determined that by reason of the rules of the House this committee has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter. It has ignored it because it has not jurisdiction. Is it possible, then, that we have jurisdiction for the purpose of recommitment and instructions to the Committee on Appropriations as to what it shall do, and can force it before the House, when we have not, as determined by the committee itself, jurisdiction to consider the subject-matter as it has been before us in this bill? The position of the gentleman is manifestly untenable.

Mr. HOOKER. If the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] which has just been stated on the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is true, then it would be in the power of the Committee of the Whole absolutely to emasculate every bill that was presented for its consideration, report it back to the House, and give the House no control of the committee in the revision of its action and in the revision of its amendments. The position of the gentleman from Tennessee is not maintainable as a parliamentary position for the reason that, if that were the case, then you can not get anything before the House that was in the bill and the Committee of the Whole had refused to act upon. The House referred it to the Committee of the Whole for its consideration, section by section, to make amendments thereto, and to report it back to the House.

But the House can not lose absolutely all control of the measure any more than the House would lose absolute control of a question which was referred to one of the standing committees of the House. If that were the case, then the standing committees of the House and the Committee of the Whole, acting upon a subject which had been referred to them, can take a section out and report the bill back to the House without any part of the bill relating to that matter in it. And then it gives the House no power over the subject-matter which it had referred to the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BRYCE. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the committee do now rise and report to the House that the committee held that the fourth section was not in order in this bill, and that it now reports that section to the House with the recommendation that the said fourth section be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report within ten days said section back to the House in a separate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution is not in order now.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. LONG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will state it.

Mr. LONG. The report which has been made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole did not state anything about the fourth section; and my parliamentary inquiry is whether or not the bill is now before us with the fourth section in it. My own belief is, Mr. Speaker, that the fourth section is still in the bill, and there is nothing in the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole which conveys to you or the House the slightest information that the fourth section has been stricken out. As a matter of fact in Committee of the Whole, upon a point of order, the fourth section was stricken out; but the House referred this bill with the fourth section in it to the Committee of the Whole as it would refer it to any other committee. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole in order that the Committee of the Whole might consider it, recommend amendments, and report it back to the House for the purpose of considering the amendments which had been adopted in the committee. It had no power to strike out on a point of order. If it on a point of order could strike out one section it could strike out other sections and the whole bill, and then you would have a bill brought back without anything pertaining to the subject in it. Now, my parliamentary inquiry is whether or not in fact the fourth section of the bill is now in it which had been stricken out in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has the same right to decide a point of order in committee as the Speaker has to decide the same point in the House. When the bill is reported back to the House with a section stricken out on a point of order the Chair is bound to respect that action of the committee.

Mr. LONG. There has been no report of that fact made to the House.

Mr. HOOKER. I propose to recommit this bill with instructions to the committee.

Mr. BURNES. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that after the previous question is ordered his motion will still be in order.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments were agreed to in gross.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to recommit the bill, with instructions to report it back to the House leaving out the fourth section, and to report back the subject-matter of the fourth section in a separate bill.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of order on that motion.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order on that motion.

Mr. HOOKER. I have made this motion, and I think I stand in an attitude where I can make it with more propriety probably than any other gentleman who agrees with me upon this subject; but I make it for the purpose of correcting a statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] in his speech which he delivered the other day during my absence at the other end of the Capitol for awhile, which I should have corrected then had I been present. I will send to the Clerk's desk a paragraph to be read from that speech, and then I will submit my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] in urging the House to pay these claimants used no mild words in speaking of those who voted to send them to the Claims Court, but now refuse to vote for an appropriation to pay their demands. Listening to the remarks of the honorable gentleman, particularly upon this point, there was reason to believe that he would explain why he was now on the claimants' side of this controversy, when in December last he voted against the resolution directing the Committee on Appropriations to report an appropriation to pay these demands. But no such explanation was made. In the speech of the gentleman, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Tuesday last, he gives the names of all members who voted for and against and those not voting for the bill to send these claimants to the Claims Court, but for reasons best known to himself he omits all mention of the names of those who voted for or against the House resolution of December last.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in response to the sentiment which was uttered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] during my absence from the Hall, and which I have had no opportunity since to reply to, in consequence of the House being engaged on points of order, that I voted in opposition to instructing the committee with reference to these claims, and I did so for the reason that on the 19th of December, when the resolution of my honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] was submitted, we had no Committee on Appropriations constituted, and of course no one knew what was to be the personnel of that committee as it was to be subsequently organized. I voted against the instruction because I did not believe that that was the best method of considering these claims. I voted against it because I believed, as I now believe, that every measure that is presented for consideration in this House ought to be presented upon its merits.

I voted against it because I would not wish to embarrass a deficiency bill by the consideration of a matter which did not pertain to it; and while I differ with the honorable Chairman of the committee who has decided this question, his decision has been adopted in Committee of the Whole, and will in all probability be adopted by the House. I voted against that resolution because I did not believe that it was proper for the House to refer any matter to a committee and instruct it how it should find on that matter, holding as I do that the judgment of the committee should be left free. That was the reason why I voted in the negative on that proposition. I did it for the reasons which were submitted by the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who participated in the debate, as I did not. Mr. MILLS said:

Let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] if he would not consent to so modify this motion as to have these claims referred to the Committee on Claims with instructions to report back as soon as possible such recommendations as they think proper, and then when you get them up before the House they will have additional weight given to them by a recommendation on the part of a committee that has thoroughly investigated their merits.

That was the reason I voted in the negative. Now, the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] in calling in question my vote upon that occasion and in explaining his own vote upon the bill of 1885, which referred these matters to the Court of Claims, endeavors to avoid the effect and responsibilty of his own vote in that case. I did not know then how he had voted, but upon examination I found that certain gentlemen had voted in favor of referring these claims, and among them, my friend from Alabama, Colonel OATES, and I referred to him by name in his presence as one of the gentlemen who had voted for that reference. Of course my remarks were equally applicable to every gentleman who so voted, and they were as applicable to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] as to any other member who voted in that way and no more so.

So far as my own vote is concerned, it was given for the reason that was urged, and in addition to the other honorable Democrats who voted with me, if I wanted authority and precedent for my action, I would find it in the fact that I voted on that question with the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] himself.

Mr. SENEY. What resolution does the gentleman refer to, the resolution of December last?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SENEY. I beg to say that I voted "no" on that resolution.

Mr. HOOKER. So did I. That is what you commented upon in your speech. I voted "no." I voted with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY]. I voted according to my convictions of what was right, and when my friend and colleague [Mr. CATCHINGS] asked me if I was opposed to these spoliation claims, I said:

No, I am not opposed to them; they are claims against the Government, and whether they be old claims or very old claims, as the gentleman from Ohio saw fit to describe them, if they are just claims they ought to be paid.

I said that I was in favor of considering upon its merits every claim presented against the Government. I voted in that way in reference to the claims of the Choctaw Nation, which had been passed upon not only by the Court of Claims but by the Supreme Court of the United States, and yet the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] who has this bill in charge moved to strike out of the Indian appropriation bill the provision to pay those claims upon the ground that it belonged not to the Committee on Indian Affairs but to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNES. I ask whether, in the discussion of a point of order, the presiding officer is required to sit and hear criticisms upon other matters not by any possible chance involved in the question at issue?

Mr. SENEY. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I do insist upon it absolutely and unconditionally.

Mr. SENEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HOOKER. I merely referred to the Choctaw claim as a cognate subject upon which there had been a ruling; not for the purpose of reflecting or making any criticism upon the action of any gentleman, but simply to show that that was the proposition that was made. Now, the honorable gentleman from Ohio, in the course of his speech, further said what I am about to read in the RECORD.

Mr. BURNES. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNES. I submit that a motion to recommit, which this substantially is, is not debatable.

Mr. HOOKER. I think it is; I differ with the gentleman. I understand the Chair so holds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is debatable, because the previous question has not been ordered upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOOKER. I will then proceed.

Mr. BLAND. My colleague [Mr. BURNES] demanded the previous question.

Mr. HOOKER. The resolution for recommitment is now before the House.

Mr. BLAND. A question of order has been raised on this proposition, and it is not before the House until the point of order has been decided.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Mississippi appears to be arguing the question of order. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. HOOKER (after a pause). Mr. Speaker, shall I proceed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may proceed.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio says further, and I will not detain the House more than a moment:

In my judgment the Congress of 1885 made a great mistake in asking the Court of Claims for advice as to the validity of these claims.

Now, it will be remembered that the honorable gentleman from Ohio had himself voted for the very bill referring these claims to the Court of Claims.

In another portion of his speech he says: "This is simply the judgment of five men." Well, Mr. Speaker, it is the judgment of five men; but of five men sitting as judges, under their oaths of office, to decide according to the merits of each particular case.

I may say further, Mr. Speaker, in answer to what has been said in opposition to these claims and their validity, that at least two Congresses before our time, a Congress in the days of President Polk and a Congress in the time of President Pierce, voted favorably upon these claims which are now characterized as fraudulent. Bills passed by both Houses of Congress for the payment of these claims were vetoed by each of the Presidents I have named. It will therefore be seen that there is no justice in characterizing these claims now as false and fraudulent, for they have been favorably acted upon by a majority of both Houses in two former Congresses.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution I have offered to recommit this bill is proper and right in order that these claims may have in due form the cognizance and consideration of this House. If any of these claims are false and fraudulent, let them be rejected; but I hold that no claim ought ever to become so old that the Congress of the United States shall not be willing to consider its justice and merit.

Mr. SENEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has controverted in any particular a single statement that was made by me when addressing the House a few days ago on this subject. If he is satisfied with the explanation that he has just made, I certainly am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to recommit the bill with instructions to report the bill back to the House, leaving out the fourth section, and to report back the subject-matter of the fourth section in a separate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this motion is not in order. It is a proposition to recommit the bill, with instructions not only to report an amendment, but to report a separate bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VETO MESSAGE—CLEMENT A. LOUNSBERRY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 2524, entitled "An act for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry."

This bill appropriates the sum of $1,214.51 to reimburse him for clerk-hire and fuel and lights in excess of allowances made to him by the Post-Office Department while he was postmaster at Bismarck, in the Territory of Dakota.

Seven hundred and fifty dollars of this sum is appropriated on account of clerk-hire paid out from April 1, 1881, to June 30, 1882, and $464.51 for lights and fuel from July 1, 1883, to September 30, 1885.

As a general rule the allowances made by the Post-Office Department in these cases ought not to be interfered with. But sometimes a sudden rush of settlement in a locality or some other cause will so increase unexpectedly the need of clerks to distribute and handle the mails that the employment of more than have been provided for is absolutely necessary.

I am inclined to think the item for clerk-hire in this bill should be so regarded. This was the only appropriation included in this bill presented in the Forty-eighth Congress in behalf of this postmaster upon which a favorable committee report was made and which was not unfavorably spoken of by the Department.

But it does not follow that the other item for fuel and lights should be allowed. I think it should not, on the grounds that the amount was fixed by the Department upon full examination, that there is no special reason shown why the postmaster should have exceeded the expenditures allowed, and that to give the least encouragement to postmasters that these allowances would be upon their application revised and increased by Congress would lead to demoralization in the service.

It appears that the allowance made to this officer for fuel and lights was increased October 1, 1883; and although the claim now made on this account embraces the period from July 1, 1883, to September, 1885, nothing was asked for fuel or lights in the bill presented to Congress for this beneficiary's relief in 1884.

It should not have been tacked upon the bill now presented.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 27, 1888.

TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th instant (the Senate concurring) I return herewith House bill No. 10060, entitled "An act prescribing the times for sales and for notice of sales of property in the District of Columbia for overdue taxes."

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 27, 1888.

DUTY ON COTTON BAGGING.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11283) to authorize the President of the United States to suspend for a given period the duty on cotton bagging; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask for the reading of that bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but before the reading was concluded,

Mr. BUCHANAN said: I waive the demand for the reading; let the bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, with leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). In the absence of objection this bill will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, ordered to be printed, and also be published in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I object.

The bill is as follows:

Whereas there has been a combination to put up the price of bagging to wrap the cotton crop in the United States, by which the price of bagging has been advanced on the farmers to nearly double the prices two or three months since; and

Whereas this will operate greatly to the damage of farmers engaged in the production of cotton: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue his proclamation suspending the collection of all customs duties on imports of any species of cotton bagging and substitutes therefor suitable for wrapping cotton for a period of six months from and after the date of such proclamation, and during the operation of said proclamation all acts and parts of acts imposing such duties are hereby suspended.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

The following petition for the proper protection of the Yellowstone National Park, as proposed in Senate bill 283, was received and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

By Mr. GEAR: Of James McCreery and 25 others, citizens of Greeley, Colo.

The following petition, indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. LYNCH: Of citizens of Hazleton, Pa.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 28, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of John Pope Hodnett, of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of a joint resolution declaring all work suspended on public improvements in the District of Columbia, to enable the workingmen and their families to attend the pic-nic of the United Labor League of America, at Athletic Park, on Ninth street northwest, between S and T streets, in Washington, D. C., on Monday, September 3, 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Mrs. Sarah E. Boudin, of West Washington, D. C., praying to be relieved from the payment of special assessment taxes, with interest thereon; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 2139) granting a pension to George Rhody; and

A bill (H. R. 10705) granting a pension to Mary L. Tanner.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 825) granting a pension to Cornelius Wessels; and

A bill (S. 3301) granting a pension to Richard J. Nichol.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3428) granting a pension to Mary C. Thompson, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 10954) for the relief of Mary Ann Reid;

A bill (H. R. 9719) for the relief of Thomas Shackelford; and

A bill (H. R. 4102) granting a pension to Mary A. Carr.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2082) for the relief of Mitchell Trotter, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3492) granting a pension to John Parkinson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the fortifications appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT ELECTRIC WIRES.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to forward to the Senate any report in their possession made by the engineer commissioner to the commissioners of the District of Columbia on the subject of overhead and under-ground electric wires.

LISTS OF CLAIMS AND JUDGMENTS.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of all claims allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, since the allowance of those already transmitted to Congress during the present session; also a list of all claims allowed by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department since the allowance of those embraced in House Executive Document No. 31, of the present session, on account of compensation of postmasters readjusted under the act of March 3, 1883; and also a list of judgments of the Court of Claims requiring an appropriation at the present session not already transmitted to Congress. The aforesaid lists to extend to and include August 31, 1888.

LAND SUITS AND LAND PATENTS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolutions; which were read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate without delay with a statement of what disposition has been made of the following items of appropriation in the acts of August 4, 1886, and March 3, 1887, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1887, and June 30, 1888, respectively, and for other purposes, hereinafter quoted, giving the name of each person who has received any portion of said appropriations and the amount received by each and the character of service each performed, together with the residence of each of said persons at the time he was selected or appointed to perform the service for which the money was paid, namely:

Depredations on public timber: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, $75,000.

Protecting public lands: For the protection of public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, $90,000.

Expenses of hearings in land entries: For expenses of hearings held by registers and receivers, under instructions from the General Land Office, to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries are of that character or have been made in compliance with law, $20,000.

Settlement of claims for swamp-land and swamp-land indemnity: For salaries and expenses of agents employed in adjusting claims for swamp-lands, and for indemnity for swamp-lands, $20,000: Provided, That agents and others employed under this and the appropriations for "Depredations on public timber" and "Protecting public lands," while traveling on duty, shall be allowed per diem, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $2.50 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation. (Act August 4, 1886.)

Depredations on public timber: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, $75,000.

Protecting public lands: For the protection of public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, $100,000.

Expenses of hearings in land entries: For expenses of hearings held by order of the General Land Office to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries are of that character or have been made in compliance with law, $20,000.

Settlement of claims for swamp-land and swamp-land indemnity: For salaries and expenses of agents employed in adjusting claims for swamp-lands, and for indemnity for swamp-lands, $20,000: Provided, That agents and others employed under this and the appropriations for "Depredations on public timber" and "Protecting public lands," while traveling on duty, shall be allowed per diem, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation. (Act March 3, 1887.)

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior furnish the Senate without delay with the number of applications for patents for public lands, including both mineral and agricultural lands, now pending and undetermined in his Department, stating the number of those pending before the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the number on appeal to the Secretary of the Interior; and also a statement of the number of patents issued in each of the public-land States and Territories during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and the amount of land covered by each of said patents.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the present consideration of the resolutions.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The resolutions had better go over.

Mr. VEST. Let them go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will lie over under the rule, and be printed.

EFFECT OF IRRIGATION ON LOWER VALLEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] August 21, 1888, in relation to the diversion of the waters of the Platte and Arkansas Rivers and their tributaries in Colorado for irrigation or other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As neither the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] nor the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is here I ask that the resolution go over, keeping its place again, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The usual order, then, will be adopted in regard to the resolution. It will be passed over, retaining its place.

TOLLS ON GOODS EXPORTED TO CANADA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], together with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR August 24, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate copies of all communications, if any, addressed by his direction to the Government of Great Britain, remonstrating with that Government against the wrongs and unfair treatment to our citizens by the action of the Canadian Government in refunding to vessels and cargoes which pass through the Welland and other Canadian canals nearly the entire tolls if they are destined to Canadian ports, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage, and the breach of the engagement contained in the treaty of 1871, whereby Great Britain promised to the United States equality in the matter of such canal transportation. Also copies of any demand made by his direction upon Great Britain for the redress of such wrongs and the replies of Great Britain to such communication and demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add:

And also that there be communicated to the Senate copies of all papers, correspondence, and information touching the matter of the refusa of the British Government, or that of any of her North American dominions, to allow the entry at Dominion sea-ports of American fish, or other cargoes, for transportation in bond to the United States since the 1st day of July, 1885. And also that he communicate to the Senate what instances have occurred since the 3d of March, 1887, of wrongs to American fishing vessels, or other American vessels, in the ports or waters of British North America, and what steps, if any, have been taken in respect thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to speak to the resolution?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether I do or not, until I make an inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to inquire of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber whether the message of the President will be formally considered to-day. If it is not going to be considered, I will submit some remarks on the pending resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the message will go with the other papers to-day to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senator can call up the message now and make his argument upon that. He has the floor on the message, and if it will suit him now, after the resolution is disposed of, I will move to proceed to the consideration of the message of the President.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that is done——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a privileged report upon the table that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] had given notice of his intention to call up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will take only a short time.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course I do not want to interfere with the conference report.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire some time during the day to submit some remarks on the President's message.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; as soon as the privileged report, the conference report, is out of the way, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the President's message, but in the mean time I should like to have this resolution calling for information from the President passed, so that it may be answered as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the report of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill may be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is done I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 3484, which was read the first time but not the second, the other day, the bill in regard to the difficulties in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator refers to the bill introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I objected to its second reading then, until the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts was disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama might desire some other consideration. The Senator introducing the bill is not present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; let it go.

Mr. HARRIS. Evidently the Senator from Alabama would have no objection to the reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the second time by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 3484) to empower the President more effectually to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, and to authorize the President to protect American interests against unjust discrimination in the use of canals in the British dominions of North America.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TELLER. I supposed that was to wait and be referred with the President's message. That was the understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. Hoping that that message will also be referred to-day, I trust the Senator will let this bill go to the committee now.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection.

Mr. VEST. Let me make a suggestion, please. Why not let all these matters, together with the President's message, go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and let them abide the result of the motion to refer the message? Why take up the matter by parcels and dispose of them? It is all the same subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reason is because the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] wants to make a speech, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] desires to make some suggestions.

Mr. VEST. I desire also myself to be heard with a few "feeble remarks" upon that subject, but it seems to me that all these matters are germane to the same subject, and the Senator from Mississippi can just as well speak upon all of them as upon the message by itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to either course; but obviously the Senate can not expect the committee to act upon the bill when it hardly knows what is contained in it.

Mr. VEST. These matters, whether a bill or a resolution, are all germane to the same subject, and that is the President's message. I hope they will all lie upon the table until the debate is ended and abide the result of the motion to refer the President's message to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senate is really anxious to have any action, the committee can not proceed a step in the matter until something is referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has been agreed to. The bill whose title has just been read was introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who desired to have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. He is not present, and on the motion of the Senator from Ohio the Chair has made that order. However, if it is desired, that order can be reconsidered and the bill still held before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the reference had better stand, because the Committee on Foreign Relations with that bill before them can consider the subject. They will consider the message of the President without a reference. It is not necessary to refer it. It may be left for debate.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the whole subject will be taken up to-day, and if possible disposed of, so that whatever ought to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations may be referred as soon as possible. I should like to occupy a few minutes' time before it is done, however, and if the appropriation bill that the Senator from Iowa desires to bring up this morning does not occupy a great deal of time, I hope the Senate will proceed to the other subject and continue it until we dispose of it, which I think perhaps can be done soon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The debate can proceed upon the motion to refer the message.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I now ask for action on the report of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. As the report is printed in the RECORD to-day, and has also been printed as a separate document, I presume that Senators will not require that it be read now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading may be waived by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. As the sundry civil appropriation bill is an important one, and as there have been at various times and in various places observations respecting this bill, I think it wise that I should at this moment state its condition and the several steps taken prior to this time respecting it.

This bill is one of the usual great appropriation bills passed at every session of Congress, and it is estimated for regularly in the Book of Estimates. In the regular estimates presented to Congress at the beginning of this session the estimates for the items in this sundry civil appropriation bill were a total of $28,742,695.26 in the Book of Estimates, and there were submitted during the session afterwards supplemental estimates amounting to $5,124,000, showing a total estimate for this bill made by the Secretary of the Treasury of $33,866,695. The House of Representatives in considering the bill passed it with a total of $23,332,406.30. The Senate Committee on Appropriations in considering the bill recommended to the Senate additional appropriations amounting to $4,012,465.18.

Mr. PLATT. All of which was estimated for?

Mr. ALLISON. Nearly every item of which was estimated for. So when the bill was reported to the Senate it was still, in round numbers, five and a half million dollars less than was estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury. The several items of increase proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations embraced three or four large items and of course a number of small items. One of the chief items of increase was in public buildings, so called. The Senate Committee on Appropriations recommended an increase of $840,000 to the amount proposed by the other House for public buildings.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator please state why we did that?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not understand the Senator from Iowa. If I correctly heard him, he said there was estimated for by the Department $28,000,000, and the House passed the bill at $23,000,000—I speak in round numbers—and that the Senate added $4,000,000 to that amount; and yet if I understood him aright he said the bill was still $5,000,000 below the estimates.

Mr. ALLISON. I will repeat my statement. I said that the original estimates of the Departments, found in the Book of Estimates, amounted, in round numbers, to $28,000,000, and that there were supplemental estimates presented from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury amounting to $5,000,000 more, which made a total estimate submitted by the Departments to cover this bill of $33,000,000. When the bill came to us from the House of Representatives it contained appropriations amounting to a little over $23,000,000, or $10,000,000 less than the estimates, to which the Senate Committee on Appropriations added, in round numbers, $4,000,000.

I was about to state the principal items of addition. The amount on public buildings was $840,000; and upon that subject I desire to say that this increase was brought about from the fact that when we took up the appropriations made for this purpose by the House of Representatives we found that in every instance they had only appropriated for public buildings which had been authorized by law and which did not carry with the authorization an appropriation, because it will be understood by Senators that for the last four or five years as respects public buildings the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have taken practical jurisdiction of that subject and have included in most of their public-building bills an appropriation covering the amount necessary to erect the buildings.

The House of Representatives appropriated for the buildings that were authorized by law, but they only appropriated one-half of the estimated cost or limit in the laws authorizing the public buildings. The Senate Committee on Appropriations believed that that was not good economy; that a public building costing less than $200,000 ought to be appropriated for in a single appropriation in order that the contracts might be made covering the entire cost of the structure. That would seem to be true economy in private affairs, and the Senate Committee on Appropriations believed it was true economy as respects these public buildings.

Not only, however, did the House of Representatives appropriate only one-half as respects these buildings, but they divided the appropriation for every public building authorized. For instance, in the case of a little building at Portsmouth, Ohio, the cost of which, under the law authorizing it, was limited to $60,000, the House appropriated one-half of that sum, or $30,000.

The effect of such a system of appropriation is to at once establish a superintendent, a clerk, a watchman, and various other public functionaries in or about the building, who are to last, and whose pay is to be taken out of the appropriation for the building until it is completed. Every man of sense knows that a building of that character ought to be built not only within a year but within six months from the time of its beginning.

So in that instance, and in many others—I merely give that as an illustration; there are half a dozen such buildings or perhaps more in this bill where the amount authorized is $75,000 or less—we appropriated in all such cases the full amount. Here, for illustration, is a post-office building at Helena, Ark. The cost of the building is to be $75,000. The House of Representatives appropriated $37,500. At Hoboken, N. J., the cost of the building is to be $60,000. The House appropriated $30,000. In two or three other instances the appropriation was $25,000 where the building authorized is to cost $50,000.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator inform the Senate how much addition was made to the bill by the Senate for public buildings alone?

Mr. ALLISON. I have already stated the amount to be $840,000. We not only made the provision for these small buildings by full appropriations, but it occurred that between the time the bill was reported to the House and passed by the House and the time when it was finally reported to the Senate by the Committee on Appropriations a number of new public buildings had been authorized which were not provided for by the House of Representatives in this bill. The Committee on Appropriations finding that the acts had been approved by the President, inserted in the bill full appropriations covering the amount of the authorized acts in every case where the authorization was less than $200,000. So we inserted in every case appropriations for the buildings that had been authorized by law prior to the time that the bill was reported; and during the progress of the bill two or three public buildings were authorized by the signature of the President to bills for public buildings which had passed both Houses, and they were added in the Senate. Thus when the bill passed from the Senate it included for public buildings only those public buildings which had been authorized by separate and distinct statutes.

I ought to pause here to say that the conference committee inserted four public buildings. We admit that it may be by some regarded as a little shade out of order, although the amendments referred embraced the general subject of public buildings, and we considered that we had fairly jurisdiction of it. We have inserted appropriations for four public buildings in the conference report where the bills had been passed after the appropriation bill had passed from the consideration of the Senate and the House and was in conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, those four bills had become laws by the approval of the President?

Mr. ALLISON. Those four bills became laws by the signature of the President.

Mr. BECK. They were started by an amendment in the House.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, the Senator is right. The House put on Opelousas.

Mr. BECK. And we added the others.

Mr. ALLISON. We added the others. The House amended one of our amendments by inserting Opelousas, La., which building is to cost $50,000, and they appropriated $25,000. To that we added in the conference Brownsville, Tex., Charlotte, N. C., Ottumwa, Iowa, and Statesville, N. C.

Mr. HALE. As an amendment to the House provision?

Mr. ALLISON. As an amendment to the House provision. So I think it was strictly in order.

I call attention to the situation as respects public buildings to show that the Senate made no amendment in regard to public buildings that they were not required to do by the rules of the Senate and by the laws already passed. When we came into conference on the question of public buildings, the House having previously inserted in the bill a provision which authorized the Supervising Architect to go beyond appropriations to make contracts and the Senate having struck out that provision, the House insisted that that provision should remain, to which we declined to agree. Thereupon we adopted, instead of the Senate rule, another rule in conference, which was that where a building costs $100,000 or more, one-half only of the appropriation should be made. The Senate yielded to that extent to the House upon this subject; but wherever there was a public building authorized which did not carry an appropriation in the bill authorizing it and which is to cost less than $100,000, by this report the entire appropriation is made for those public buildings. The result of that is to reduce the amount originally reported to the Senate for public buildings some two or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. TELLER. It reduces the $840,000?

Mr. ALLISON. It reduces the $840,000 some two or three hundred thousand dollars, because we were obliged to give way, I will say to the Senator, $60,000 on his public building in Denver which we had added. The House appropriating originally $140,000 for the public building at Denver, and the Supervising Architect having said to the Senate and to the Committee on Appropriations that he could economically expend $200,000 in the progress of that building in the next year, we added $60,000 to it. But the House insisted that inasmuch as we were now two months in the year it was probable he could get on with $140,000, as they had provided in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to say about that building that the Supervising Architect declared that $200,000 was essential to enable him to let proper contracts, for instance for the iron-work. The public building at Denver, which is to cost when completed about $535,000, has been in course of construction about six years. During all that time it has progressed—or it had at the last information I had, and I think it is no higher now—up to very nearly the first story above the street, that is, one story above the street. No joists have been put on nor contracted for, as I understand. During all that time there has been employed the usual retinue of employés about it, adding greatly to the expense.

When the officer who has it in charge says that $200,000 is necessary for an economical management to make proper contracts, it does seem to me that unless there was some overwhelming necessity the conferees on the part of the Senate ought to have stood for the whole amount. I will venture to say that at the rate the building is going on it will not be constructed in five or six years, and it will cost more for superintendence and all that than any building that ever was erected anywhere in the United States, by any individual at least, and probably by even the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The army that attends it will be paid.

Mr. TELLER. As suggested, the army that attends it will be paid, and that all the time comes out of the appropriation and reduces the size and the value of the building.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think I ought here, before I pass from the question of public buildings, to call attention to the fact that a great number of public buildings have been authorized at this session of Congress by bills which have passed both Houses of Congress carrying with them appropriations amounting to two or three million dollars, and that the Committee on Appropriations have only gathered up, as it were, a sort of residuum of those bills—the bills that by accident or mistake or design did not carry appropriations; and I ought to say one thing further, and that is that at this session and in this bill there are a great many public buildings provided for at small towns and places like Brownsville, Tex. I see my friend from Texas in my eye.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. At Brownsville there is a Federal court, there is a custom-house, and there is also an internal-revenue collection office. The population is some five or six thousand.

Mr. ALLISON. A population of how much?

Mr. COKE. A population of 5,000 or 6,000; and right opposite is the city of Matamoros, in Mexico, with 20,000 inhabitants.

Mr. ALLISON. I observe a bill for a public building at Texarkana, Ark., appropriating $100,000, passed at this session, and it is provided for in this bill; one at Statesville, N. C.; one at Asheville, N. C.; and bills for public buildings at numerous other cities and towns that I might mention, varying in the number of inhabitants from 1,000 to 6,000, as in the case of Brownsville. And yet these bills carrying these appropriations for public buildings in these small villages and towns, some of them without courts and many of them with small populations and little or no business, have in some way been able to run the gauntlet of these two Houses and run the gauntlet of the Presidential approval.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BERRY. I will state that Texarkana has 7,000 or 8,000 inhabitants. It has a Federal court, however, and for that reason it is different from some of the other towns of which the Senator has spoken.

Mr. ALLISON. When was the court established, may I ask my friend?

Mr. BERRY. It was established during the last Congress, the Forty-ninth Congress. I can not see, however, that it is very material when the court was established provided the court is there.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas now. Texarkana has a population of 2,000 more than Brownsville, where they have 6,000.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that at Texarkana the town is in two States, Texas and Arkansas, and both growing towns.

Mr. ALLISON. It has a very great advantage, being in two States.

Mr. COKE. Brownsville, Tex., on which the Senator harps so much, is the oldest point in Texas where the Federal court is held. It is near the mouth of the Rio Grande, where an important custom-house is situated and where it is most essential to have a custom-house.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not criticising these things except to point a moral, that these little villages in North Carolina, in Texas, in Mississippi, and in Arkansas can have their public-building bills not only railroaded through these two Houses—I have no doubt I voted for all of them—but they pass the scrutiny of the President of the United States; and yet when a bill comes here from the State in which I live and from a city having more than 30,000 inhabitants and nearly as much trade as there is in half the State of North Carolina, the President sends us a message, sneering in its tone and I think undignified in its character, saying that a public building is not necessary at Sioux City.

I merely call attention to these things for the purpose of showing that it depends, or seems to depend, upon the location of these public buildings whether they can become laws. There has been a United States court held at Sioux City for the last six years, and the terms of that court have run from ten days to five weeks in duration. It is in the heart of a vigorous, aggressive population, commercial in its character, having a large business. It not only has the advantage of Texarkana and Brownsville in population, but it lies on the Missouri River, having the State of Nebraska immediately opposite. If it is important to have a public building in Texarkana because it lies near Texas, how much more important it must be to have a public building at Sioux City because it is near Nebraska? Not only that, but it is also near the great Territory of Dakota, with its 700,000 people that can not yet get into the Union.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the public building at Texarkana is in Texas and in Arkansas. The town is on both sides of the line between the two States.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina appeals to the Senator from Iowa. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. What is the amount of the appropriation asked for Sioux City?

Mr. ALLISON. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars. That is not in this bill, I will say to the Senator. I merely alluded to it incidentally.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator sees proper to make reflections upon the small villages in North Carolina so much, I wish simply to say to the Senator that the town of Asheville, which he alluded to, has a population of 10,000; it has a Federal court and all the accessories for the conduct of Federal business. The town of Statesville, which is the smallest town in the State that has received an appropriation for a public building, has not more than 4,000 people; but I beg the Senator to remember that in an agricultural country like ours the amount of business and the number of people to be accommodated is not measured by the size of the town. The territory that the court at Statesville accommodates is larger, I venture to say, and has more population than that dependent upon Sioux City in its business, and it only has an appropriation of $75,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt of the fact that in an agricultural State like North Carolina, where corn is converted in small quantities, there is likely to be more Federal business than there is in a State like Iowa, so that I am not complaining of the court at Asheville.

Mr. WALTHALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALTHALL. What was the little village in Mississippi to which the Senator had reference?

Mr. ALLISON. I did not allude to a little village in Mississippi. I alluded to the general statement that among these public buildings are public buildings provided for where there are less than 2,000 people. I did not say that such instances occurred in Mississippi.

Mr. WALTHALL. The Senator mentioned Mississippi as one of the States where little villages have been provided for.

Mr. ALLISON. I think Vicksburg was provided for. I know, of course, that is a large city, but it is not as large as Sioux City and it does not have one-third of the business, yet Vicksburg gets a court-house without objection anywhere. What I complain of is not that Vicksburg has a court-house, but that these unjust and unnatural discriminations are made against localities.

Mr. WALTHALL. Does the Senator class Vicksburg as a village?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not. I have been there. I know what it is.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. With my colleague's permission I desire to have the Secretary read a statement of facts relative to Sioux City, Iowa. It has been carefully prepared. I have informed myself definitely with reference to it. I have no doubt of its entire correctness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the paper, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN MATTER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Sioux City has a population, as shown by the census of September, 1887, of 32,000; population shown by national census, 1880, 7,300.

Total increase in seven years, 24,700.

She has ten lines of railroads centering there.

She has eight large banking institutions.

She has twenty wholesale stores.

She has the largest oil mill in the world, except one, pressing 2,100 bushels of flax-seed daily.

She is the largest meat center west of Chicago. Killing capacity, 17,000 hogs, 2,500 cattle, and 500 sheep, daily.

She has 1,600 acres in her stock-yards, with a feeding capacity of 50,000 head of cattle continuously.

Of her four daily papers, one is devoted exclusively to stock-yards and markets; also one bank is supported and maintained by same interest.

Houses built in 1887, 503.

Buildings enlarged, 116.

Total amount of expenditures for public buildings of all kinds for 1887, $2,854,856.

Total expenditures, railroad bridge and all, over $4,000,000.

United States court was established by Forty-seventh Congress.

Officers now located there: District attorney, deputy marshal, paymaster, pension examiner, United States headquarters military and Indian supplies.

Post-office business for year ending June 30, 1887:
Gross revenue	$39,684.91
Net revenue	24,926.72
Domestic money-order business for year ending June 30, 1887:
Orders paid	113,420.55
Orders issued	60,059.28
Total	173,479.83

The net revenue from Sioux City post-office is greater than any city in Iowa, except Des Moines.

The business in Federal courts has quadrupled in last two years.

Mr. ALLISON. That tells its own tale. I am very much obliged to my colleague for putting those facts in the RECORD.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for an observation?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have noticed for the past ten years, during my service in this body, that it has never been a difficult matter at all to get large appropriations of money for public buildings in Western States and even Territories. I doubt if there is a city of any importance in the State of Iowa that has not been heretofore provided with a public building and been provided for otherwise.

Mr. ALLISON. That observation, I will say to my friend, is an entire mistake on his part.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to draw a simple comparison, which is this: In New Jersey, one of the original thirteen States, with a population of nearly a million and a half of people, the Government of the United States until within the past two years has only owned one public building. We have two cities of 200,000 people and five or six cities with populations ranging from 50,000 to 160,000, and yet with all the persistent efforts we have made to secure appropriations for needed public buildings we have been unable to get them. But I notice when you go to Nevada or any of the Western States or Territories you find more money invested by the National Government in public buildings than has ever been invested in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. STEWART. How much has been appropriated in Nevada? Does the Senator know?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I notice that there are large appropriations asked for in this bill. I believe that a large appropriation was made for a public building at Portland, Oregon, some years ago. The cost of the public building at Portland alone, if my memory serves me aright, is more than equal to the entire cost of all the public buildings in New Jersey.

Mr. ALLISON. I will resume the floor.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to state about Nevada.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to my friend on my right for a moment.

Mr. STEWART. There has been appropriated in all for public buildings in Nevada, outside the mint, $136,000, and the Territory of Nevada built public buildings at a cost amounting to $60,000, which the General Government has been in the habit of refunding to Territories, but which it has never refunded to Nevada. So we have got less than $100,000.

Mr. McPHERSON. How much is appropriated in this bill or by legislation in this Congress for Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. There is no appropriation whatever for Nevada.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no public building provided for in Nevada.

Mr. McPHERSON. How much for Oregon? I think there is some $600,000 for buildings in Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I prefer to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. ALLISON. I was merely observing, Mr. President, that in small places, like Tallahassee, Fla., and like Statesville, N. C., and sundry and divers other places that I never heard of until I saw them in these appropriations and in the various public-buildings bills, and therefore I can not remember them all. Of course I do not include Asheville, in Buncombe County.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that in the county of Buncombe?

Mr. ALLISON. That is in the county of Buncombe, and that is one of the rapidly growing cities, as I well know. But I am not finding fault with these appropriations. I am only now calling attention to the discriminations made respecting them, showing how easy it is for certain States of this Union to get appropriations for public buildings where the needs of the public service do not require them as much as they are required in other States and cities where these buildings are actually needed, and I am in sympathy somewhat with the Senator from New Jersey when he says that New Jersey has not hitherto had its share of these public buildings in order to carry on economically the public business in the great cities of that State.

Now I pass from the question of public buildings and call attention to the next considerable item in the Senate increase of appropriations—the item for light-houses, etc. I think there is something rather singular about the appropriations for the Light-House Establishment. I see in the Book of Estimates light-houses estimated for to the extent of $1,300,000, and when the House bill came to us there was appropriated only $139,000 for light-houses where $1,300,000 had been estimated for, and if my memory serves me aright two of the light-houses provided for in the House bill were not estimated for at all. So, as the bill came to us, there seemed to be a discarding of the Book of Estimates and practically no appropriations for light-houses.

We put upon this bill additions to the amount of $631,000 for light-houses, less than half the estimates for that object, and I am glad to say that the conferees on the part of the House agreed to most of these amendments, requiring us in some cases to reduce the amounts appropriated, although the Light-House Board had informed us that the amounts inserted in the bill (because the amounts proposed to be inserted were offered at their request) were not more than sufficient to complete the light-houses.

There are large miscellaneous appropriations involved in this bill where the Senate made additions, as for example the Library. Of the $4,000,000 added to the bill, one million was for the Library, making, as we supposed, with attention and care, proper provision for its expenditure. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] properly reminds me at this stage that whilst that is one of the disagreeing votes, I think I may fairly say that it is probable our action may be agreed to in the end.

Another large item in these miscellaneous items is an addition to the appropriation for the expenses of the collection of customs of $450,000. Another item of $50,000 is respecting the enforcement of the alien contract-labor act, and another item of $535,000 respecting the keeping of the Hudson River clear of débris, etc., under a law passed last year, and specially estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury in a special communication which I have on my desk, in which he asked the Senate to add $535,000 to this appropriation; and yet only a few days ago he became responsible, so the public newspapers say, for a statement showing the amount of the appropriations as made by the House of Representatives, and showing the increases put on by the Senate.

Mr. President, with rare exceptions, there is not a single item of appropriation in this bill, whether passed originally by the House or put on by the Senate, that did not receive the urgent solicitation of the Cabinet minister who had charge of the particular business involved in the appropriation.

Of course for the Public Library and for one or two other items of considerable amount here, where the Senate exercises its own discretion, there is no such request from the head of a Department; but on this bill, where we have added appropriations, we have added them because of laws passed since this bill came originally from the House or because of urgent solicitations from the head of a Department that it was necessary to have the appropriations in order to carry on the ordinary and necessary work of the Government.

We added in the Senate pretty largely for military posts, but we fell far short of the estimates of the War Department as respects military posts, and we were obliged to give up a portion of what we inserted as respects military posts. So we added $200,000 for national soldiers' homes at the request of the managers of the national homes coming before the Senate Committee on Appropriations and not only making that request in the interest of the dependent soldiers, but making an argument which absolutely convinced us that these additions were necessary in order to carry on these homes. General Franklin, Governor Martin, of Kansas, and Mr. Sewell, of New Jersey, lately a prominent and an honored member of this body, all made these urgent requests, and these appropriations were added because we were satisfied that they were necessary.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me say that they are absolutely necessary in order to house the men who are taken in or soon will be, in order to simply cover them from the weather, if we receive them at all.

Mr. ALLISON. They showed us that in two or three of these homes now men are lying in the halls, in the corridors, and everywhere where a bed can be improvised to give them shelter during the night.

So much, Mr. President, for the details of this bill. I think perhaps I ought to state the matters which have not been agreed on, and perhaps make an observation or two respecting them, because the House conferees say they can not agree to these amendments without conferring with the House. I think it is equally important that the Senate conferees should in a general way consult the views of the Senate on these disagreeing votes.

The first disagreeing vote is on the item respecting the family of Professor Baird. I need not allude to that in detail.

Next is the amendment which we inserted here appropriating $100,000 for the Mexican boundary survey. The House conferees tell us that they will not consent to this appropriation although we have bound ourselves to make it by solemn treaty with the Government of Mexico, and I am told—and I hope one of the Senators from Texas will correct me if I am mistaken—that from the point where the boundary diverges from the Rio Grande to the Pacific Ocean, it traverses a country where the boundary is now practically unknown, because the old landmarks have passed away.

Thus there is a new neutral ground varying from 5 to 10 miles in width, where people do not know whether they are in the Republic of Mexico or in the United States. The Secretary of State sent to us at this session an urgent and persistent letter, asking us to appropriate $100,000 for the completion of this Mexican boundary survey. We appropriated two years ago $100,000, and that whole sum lies in the Treasury because it is not sufficient to complete the survey, and it is a useless waste of money to begin the work until it can be completed. Yet this amendment of $100,000 thus put on in the Senate, estimated for in a letter written to us by the Secretary of State, the treaty facing us, the House of Representatives thus far declines to consent to it.

The building for the Library of Congress I have alluded to already. I think there will not be so much trouble about that.

The next is the amendment, disagreed to, relative to the removal of the Bureau of Education to the Pension building. That involves no money, and therefore it may be that in the end that will be consented to, although I think it is very doubtful whether the House of Representatives will agree to a change of the law in that respect.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that item to be still in conference.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; disagreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I have a good deal of information bearing on that matter, which I asked to have printed the other day to save the time of the Senate, that might be available to the committee; and if they had it, either they must insist upon the perpetration of murder by making this change or the House will assent to the position of the Senate on this question.

Mr. ALLISON. I am willing, if there is no objection from others, that whatever the Senator says is proper to be printed in this connection shall be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. I propose to put it before the Senate during the debate unless it may be printed, because it comes to be a vital thing. It is a proposition to put everybody connected with the Bureau of Education into the fourth story, in rooms which have no windows, except the skylights, the floors of which are of cement, and where the average temperature during the months specified here by actual measurement and observation is from 98 to 103 degrees.

Mr. CULLOM. The fourth story of what building?

Mr. BLAIR. Of the Pension building. It is absolutely uninhabitable, and there is no other space but that where this great bureau—for it is a great bureau now—can be put in that building.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will be allowed to print whatever he thinks will throw any light upon this subject, because we have a very serious controversy about it, and one which it does not look as though we could agree about.

Mr. BLAIR. Let me say just one word more, because this is a vital thing. That bureau will be destroyed by this proposed change, and I call the attention of the Senate to the information, which, if there be no objection, I shall have printed in the RECORD. This proposed change is protested against by the Secretary of the Interior after a recent personal inquiry and examination, by the Commissioner of Pensions, by the Commissioner of Education, and by the superintendent of the Pension building, who has carefully examined with reference to it and gives specific information, upon which I base the assertion that it will be a deliberate, premeditated murder to put these employés of the Government where they will have to go if the change is made, and this is independent of the fact of the practical destruction of the library, of the museum, of the various means of educational illustration which have been collected at vast expense, so that now in this direction we have altogether the best educational collection or museum that is to be found on the face of the earth.

Mr. BECK. I want, with the permission of the chairman, to say one word. The Senator from New Hampshire himself recognizes the fact that the law as it now stands requires the Bureau of Education to go to the Pension building. That is the law. Now, we make a proposition to exempt this bureau from having to go there under existing law. If the House persists and refuses to agree to the amendment of the existing law, I do not see how we are to get out of it, except by having a separate bill providing for the repeal of the existing law.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that, and yet this same bill makes provision for the repeal of the existing law so far as to exempt the Land Office from removal. The reasons are equally strong why the removal of the Bureau of Education should not take place. I can not but think that whoever makes opposition to this amendment does so with a failure to appreciate the fact that the Bureau of Education is as important a bureau in the operations of this Government and in its usefulness to the American people as some other bureaus which apparently receive vastly more consideration and which yet do not aim at the vital, intellectual, and moral life of the nation as does this bureau. I do not think it is appreciated enough or ever has been.

Mr. ALLISON. I consent that those documents may be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. I will add them to what little I have now said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator propose that the papers be printed as a document?

Mr. BLAIR. I understood they were to be printed in the RECORD, so that they would be available to the committee and to the Senate. I will enumerate the documents.

Mr. ALLISON. I will not ask the Senator to enumerate them. I am content, if the Senator is, that they go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And not be printed separately as a document?

Mr. ALLISON. No; printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

The papers are as follows:

LETTER OF SECRETARY OF INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, July 30, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: I observe that by the sundry civil bill, as it has been reported by the Committee on Appropriations to the Senate, the only repeal of the act of March 3, 1887, which required the removal of the General Land Office, Bureau of Railroads, and Bureau of Education to the Pension building, provided for is so much as relates to the Land Office. I do most sincerely think it will be a serious injury to the Educational Bureau and also to the Pension Bureau to compel the removal of the former into the Pension building. It can not but practically strangle the Bureau of Education for a considerable period at least, and I can not see but that it must seriously interfere with its usefulness so long as it shall remain there. There are now about forty-three clerks and people employed in the Bureau of Education, and they have a large collection of books, models, educational appliances, and bric-a-brac of various character and all contributory to enlightenment. I have visited the Pension building and can not see how this can be stored, except in great part in the fourth story. Practically, it becomes when placed there unavailable for use.

The appropriation in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill on account of the Bureau of Education is, altogether, $50,920. The rent of the building to be saved by this change is $4,000. In order to save this sum of $4,000 of rent I do not hesitate to say that this action will waste $25,000 of the appropriation for the bureau.

I have heard the idea expressed in casual conversation that the Bureau of Education was not an instrumentality of especial value, and I fear that this idea has had something to do with the willingness to cripple it by this removal.

I do not concur at all in the sentiment; but if the sentiment is to have any influence, and especially under the plea of economy, it should take an effective direction to accomplish the latter end; and this would require that, in case of this removal being insisted upon, a great part of the force should be discharged and the appropriation made for the conduct of the bureau diminished. I do not doubt that it could be diminished one-half, upon the theory of the removal, and as effective work be accomplished as if the same number of officers and employés shall be retained now provided for, because they can not work to advantage in such quarters as can be assigned in the Pension Bureau.

The legislative bill has made provision for the rent of the building now occupied by the Bureau of Education only until the 1st of December next, appropriating $1,667 for that purpose, one-third of the annual rental. The time is short and the pressure upon Congress, and especially upon you, my dear sir, I recognize to be very great at this juncture. Is it not the part of wisdom to continue that bureau where it is for the remainder of this fiscal year, which will involve but $2,333 more (perhaps less than the cost of its removal), and review this subject at the next session with more attention than can now be allowed to it?

If it be possible for yourself, or some member of the committee, to give an hour or an hour and a half to a personal examination of the circumstances, I feel convinced you will recognize by a survey of the buildings and the property involved the imperative urgency and wisdom of the suggestion I venture to make.

The provision for the post-office within the area of the Pension building will make that building as thoroughly occupied as almost any Government building in the city, perhaps quite as much.

I have the honor to be, my dear Mr. Chairman,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, D. C., July 30, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I have recently made several visits to the Pension building with a view of learning what accommodations can be secured therein for the Bureau of Education. At your suggestion, I give you the result of my observations and inquiries.

The building consists of three-columned arcades, one above the other, and above all a fourth gallery, the whole surrounding a vast court.

The rooms of the three main floors of the building are commodious and spacious, but seem to be fully occupied by the large force of the Pension Office. The first deputy commissioner assured me that they absolutely could not spare sufficient space to accommodate the Bureau of Education. The chief clerk explained in detail that there are but two rooms on the three main floors which have not yet been occupied; that in some of their rooms thirty clerks are placed; that the average for all the habitable rooms is seventeen clerks, and that several of their large divisions are very much overcrowded and must soon have additional room.

As for the upper gallery it is out of the question, being a narrow footway railed with iron, upon which open a suite of rooms under the roof. These are of low pitch without any windows or mode of lighting, except skylights. Three-fourths of them are already filled with the filing cases and shelved documents of the Pension Office. They are entirely unfit for human occupancy, the temperature ranging in summer from 87½° to 103½°. (See accompanying report of superintendent of building.)

Such being the situation it seems to me manifestly impossible to remove this office to the Pension building. You will remember that our moderate estimates show that for our library, museum, and documents we shall need 8,000 square feet, and for our clerical force 3,600 square feet. For the proper accommodation of the Commissioner of Education, the chief clerk, and clerical force several separate rooms are essential; in the Commissioner's opinion, not less than ten.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. V. HOLCOMBE,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR,
Senate Chamber.

[Exhibit ——.]

STATEMENT OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF THE BUREAU OF PENSIONS BUILDING.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., April 9, 1888.

I have the honor to herewith submit a report of the number of rooms in the Pension building, together with a statement of the number of square feet floor space suitable for office purposes, the whole number of employés in the building, and the average number of square feet floor space to each employé; also a statement of the reasons why the fourth floor and the basement of the building ought not, or, more properly speaking, can not, be used for office purposes.

The whole number of rooms in the building is 96, as follows:

	Square feet.
4 rooms 16 by 30, 480 square feet each	1,920
12 rooms 26 by 30, 780 square feet each	9,360
4 rooms 16 by 36, 576 square feet each	2,304
6 rooms 26 by 28, 728 square feet each	4,368
8 rooms 15 by 25, 375 square feet each	3,000
2 rooms 12 by 36, 432 square feet each	864
60 rooms 26 by 36, 936 square feet each	55,160
96 Total square feet floor space	77,976

These 96 rooms are now occupied as follows:

Occupied by division files	19
Commissioner, one large and one small	2
First Deputy Commissioner	1
Second Deputy Commissioner	1
Chief clerk	1
Assistant chief clerk	1
Commissioner's clerks	1
Clerical force	70
Total	96

The "division files" mentioned in the above statement refers to the "pending files" in the adjudicating divisions of the Bureau of Pensions, and which can not be separated from the divisions to which they belong.

Of the file cases in use in the adjudicating divisions, 21 are as many as can possibly be crowded into one room. The whole number of file cases in the bureau is 357, occupying floor space equal to 19 large rooms, or 17,216 square feet. The 7 rooms occupied by the officers of the bureau cover 5,991 feet, which added to the 19 rooms, or 17,216 square feet, occupied by the division files, makes a total of 26 rooms, or 23,207 square feet, leaving 70 rooms, or 54,769 square feet floor space, for the clerical force of the office.

The whole number of desks in the Bureau of Pensions is 1,400, or an average of 20 to the room, with an average floor space of a fraction less than 40 square feet to the desk.

The number of employés in the building is 1,265 and the average number in each room is 18. The two extra desks are used for distributing purposes and are necessary in the work of the divisions.

In this computation I have taken no account of the fourth floor or the basement or cellar of the Pension building, as neither is fit for office purposes. The basement is dark and damp, with rough grout or brick floors, no windows, and wholly unfit for any purpose other than lumber or coal storage rooms.

The rooms on the fourth floor can not, in my opinion, be utilized for offices. There are no windows in these rooms, the only light coming from a skylight in the roof, and the only ventilation is through a 2 by 2 scuttle hole in the roof. The ceilings are low and flat and the floors are made of cement. In the hot summer season these rooms are not fit for human beings to work in on account of the intense heat and the stifling atmosphere.

The following record kept during the first half of July last will indicate the condition of the rooms on this floor in the hot summer days:

Temperature of file-rooms of western division.

Date.	Under sky-light.	Outer wall.	Inner wall.	Mean temper-ature.	Time.
1887.					p. m.
June 30	105	97	92	98	1.30
July 1	120	96	92	102⅔	1.30
July 2	119	97	93	103	1.30
July 5	110	96	92	99½	1.30
July 6	109	95	92	98⅔	1.30
July 7	114	88	86	96	1.30
July 8	117	89	88	103½	12.30
July 8	104	90	87	92⅔	2.30
July 9	93	86	84	87⅔	12.30
July 9	106	96	84	95½	2.30
July 11	120	86	84	96⅔	12.30
July 11	114	87	85	93½	2.00
July 12	120	87	85	96⅔	12.30
July 12	115	89	87	97	2.00
July 13	122	90	89	100⅓	12.30
July 13	115	92	90	99	2.00
July 14	123	92	89	101½	12.30
July 14	116	93	90	99⅓	2.00
July 15	120	89	87	98⅓	12.30
July 15	117	90	89	91	2.00
July 16	112	.....	94	.....	1.30

A proposition to occupy these rooms for office purposes ought not, in my judgment, to be considered.

As stated above the total square feet floor space suitable for office purposes in the Pension building is 77,978. This room is all occupied, and some of the divisions are yet much crowded. The middle, eastern, western, certificates, medical, law and stationery and accounts divisions ought each to have more room than they now have.

The Commissioners of the four bureaus which it is proposed to move into the Pension building estimate the space required by their respective bureaus as follows:

	Square feet.
General Land Office	32,623
Bureau of Education	11,600
Bureau of Labor	3,600
Commissioner of Railroads (estimated)	2,500
Or a total of	50,323

Which is equal to almost two-thirds of the entire floor space of all the rooms, or in other words, almost the whole of the first and second floors of the building.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

W. F. SCHUCKERS,
Superintendent of Building.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., April 11, 1888.

SIR: The undersigned members of the commission appointed under the order of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, a copy of which is hereto attached, beg leave to submit as their conclusions in regard to the occupancy of the Pension building, of the Bureaus of the Land Office, of Education, of Labor, and of Railroads, as follows:

1. They report that the upper new floor of the said Bureau of Pensions building is not adapted and can not be safely used by the clerks of the Government on account of its very great heat.

2. They report that the basement of the building and court floor space of said building are, neither of them, fit nor safe for use by said clerks. The reason for the conclusion as to the basement is found in the report of the superintendent of the building made to the Commissioner of Pensions and herewith submitted.

The reasons for believing that the floor space of the court of said Bureau of Pension building can not be used for clerical purposes arise from the facts clearly demonstrated to your commission.

The clerks might almost as well be set in an open street so far as purposes of health are concerned; owing to the great height of the room there is much movement of air therein, and the variations in temperature are such that it would be necessary to use heavy wraps a portion of the time in the performance of clerical duties by such force.

3. This reduces the available space for the use of clerks to the first, second, and third floors of said building, which are all of them now fully occupied, as is shown by the said inclosed report of the superintendent of the building aforesaid, to which reference is hereby made.

4. It will be wholly impracticable to put the Bureaus aforesaid of the General Land Office, of Education, of Labor, and of Railroads in said building. The reasons therefor are found in the annexed individual statements of the chiefs of said bureaus, and in the dimension and present occupation of said first, second, and third floors, as set forth in the said superintendent's report aforesaid.

The final conclusion of the commission is that the attempt is wholly impracticable, that it would be detrimental to the public service and to the health of the individual members of the clerical force engaged in said service.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN C. BLACK,
Commissioner of Pensions.
N. H. R. DAWSON,
Commissioner of Education.
CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor.
S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Commissioner General Land Office.
J. E. JOHNSTON,
Commissioner of Railroads.

HON. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I beg leave to present to you, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, a summary statement of the requirements of the present law and pending bills for the proposed removal of this office into the Pension building, and the needs of the office in case the removal is effected.

The sundry civil bill of 1886 (first session Forty-ninth Congress, page 238) requires that "not later than December 1, 1888, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be removed to the Pension building the General Land Office, Bureau of Education, Office of the Commissioner of Railroads, and Bureau of Labor."

The pending legislative, etc., appropriation bill as passed by the House provided for the rent of the building occupied by the Bureau of Education only till December 1st next. The sundry civil bill as lately passed by the House repeals the act of 1886 so far, and only so far, as it relates to the General Land Office.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations, apparently under the impression that the House had repealed the requirement of removal as to all the offices affected, has amended the legislative appropriation bill, so as to allow an entire year's rent for the buildings occupied, and the bill so amended has passed the Senate.

What is necessary now is that the Senate insist upon its amendment which allows the rent for a year (Messrs. ALLISON, DAWES, and COCKRELL are the conference committee); and then amend the sundry civil bill, now before the Appriations Committee by extending the repealing clause of the House so as to include this office.

In regard to the needs of the Bureau of Education, on March 31, 1888, the following estimates were given to the Commissioner of Pensions, showing the amount of space that would be required in case of its removal to the Pension Building:

	Square feet.
Commissioner and the clerical force	3,600
Museum	3,500
Library	2,500
Storing and handling documents	2,000
Total	11,600

The above estimates were based as nearly as possible upon the present requirements of the office, not allowing for any increase in clerical force, collections, or facilities.

A statement regarding the character and extent of the collections owned by the bureau will show how moderate those estimates are.

The library of the bureau is a growth of twenty-one years, acquired by gift, by exchange, and by purchase from many different countries. It has been selected with care, with the design that it should be strictly pedagogical in character. The result is that the Government has acquired, at a very moderate cost, the largest and best purely educational library in the world, embracing original works, journals, magazines, and official reports in all civilized languages. The number of bound volumes exceeds twenty thousand, and the pamphlets, seventy-five thousand, besides many duplicates to be used in exchanges.

The bureau has made an excellent beginning toward the formation of a complete pedagogical museum, which is intended to contain material illustrating every step, process, and apparatus useful in every grade of instruction. It now possesses a very extensive collection, perhaps unequaled anywhere else in the world, embracing globes, maps, tellurions; botanical, chemical, and zoological specimens; casts, photographs, drawings, engravings, etchings, models; specimens of lacquer, bronze, marble, and other artistic material; a large amount of very delicate and valuable optical and physical apparatus; a quantity of kindergarten material, and a rare and beautiful collection of Japanese needle work and school literature and apparatus presented by the Japanese Government.

To properly protect and use these two unequaled collections, the library and the museum, to make them available to the working force of the bureau, whose tools they are, and accessible to the educational public who resort to them for study and research, the amount of space above estimated is barely sufficient. By actual measurement the shelves and cases containing the books and files of the bureau extend to 538 feet, not including the basement in which the publications are stacked. The thirty or more glass cases of the museum measure 240 feet. If, therefore, the shelves and cases of the bureau were placed end to end, they would form a line that would reach more than three average squares, the greater part of it being 10 feet high.

The general argument against removal, being a full and clear statement of the kind of work done in this office and the special kind of accommodations and facilities required, together with an exposition of the damage to property, the interruption and delay of work, the inconvenience suffered, and expense incurred in a former removal, may be found in a letter of the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior of April 6, 1888, of which a copy can be furnished you if needed.

Relying on your interest in the welfare of the bureau and its continued usefulness, I am, sir,

Very respectfully, yours,

J. W. HOLCOMBE,
Acting Commissioner.

HON. H. W. BLAIR,
Senate Chamber.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, D. C., April 6, 1888.

SIR: In addition to the reasons suggested in the report made to you by the Commissioners of Pensions, the Land Office, Labor, Railroads, and Education, why those offices should not be removed to the Pension building, I beg to submit additional reasons why this office should not be so transferred.

The duties performed by the employés of the Bureau of Education, though nominally clerical, are entirely different from those performed by clerks in most offices. The work in other offices is ministerial and pertains chiefly to the reception, record, custody, and adjudication of papers requiring executive action. On the contrary the principal duty of this bureau is the collection, preparation, and publication of reports and such other documents as shall seem best fitted to benefit public schools and improve the means of education; in other words, much of the work is original.

In its investigations this bureau deals largely with documents of a statistical and historical character, and needs for the full performance of its work the use of books and apparatus to which no parallel can be found in the ordinary service of most Government bureaus. The methods, appliances, and surroundings of these two kinds of intellectual labor can not be identically the same and produce equally satisfactory results. Most of the employés of the Bureau of Education are called "clerks" or "copyists," but the actual duties performed by them are the collection of facts, comparison of authorities, compilation of reading matter, calculation and construction of statistical tables, and the general investigation of educational causes, conditions, and results, both past and present, near and remote, domestic and foreign. To perform these duties successfully its employés need not only what other employés should have, good light, good air, comfortable temperature, and properly constructed seats and desks, but several things not ordinarily required, such as an ample collection of books, close at hand and ready for reference at any moment; a museum of articles relating to the construction of educational buildings, the furniture of school-rooms, and the apparatus of instruction; space around each employé for the proper use of books and articles from the library and museum; and a greater freedom from the disturbance and noise which inevitably exist along with large numbers of fellow-employés, no matter how orderly their behavior. It is quite possible in ordinary offices to organize clerks into divisions each having two or three hundred men, with subdivisions of correspondingly large size. It is utterly impossible to do this in such an office as the Bureau of Education without sacrificing both the unity and the accuracy of results. So much as to the reasons affecting the personnel and the duty of the office.

In consequence of the requirements of its work this bureau since 1870 has accumulated a very valuable library of twenty thousand volumes, sixty thousand pamphlets, and many thousands of duplicates, and a museum of approximately twenty thousand articles. These books and articles have been collected from all civilized countries. The books are in many languages, and are on all subjects relating to education of every grade and form. The space assigned them in the present building is inadequate to their perfect use, it is true, but is so apportioned that the most useful and necessary parts of these collections are at once accessible while effectually protected from the intrusion of unauthorized persons.

Experience everywhere has developed certain preferable and convenient methods and ways of storing, classifying, indexing, issuing, and using collections like these for the purpose of study; and these, so far as they are applicable to the duty of the office, have been adopted, and are now in force. If, however, the bureau and its property be transferred to a building constructed and occupied for entirely different purposes these valuable collections would be exposed to serious damage and loss, the present arrangements and appliances for their safe custody and effective use would be entirely abolished, and a new set of methods and appliances would have to be devised, tried, and modified to suit the new circumstances. Isolation of the office and its property as at present organized I deem essential to the usefulness of one and the safety of the other.

The removal of these collections is no mere matter of transportation from one building to another, but will require the expenditure of time, care, and money. The loss of time in making such a removal will be great; the loss of convenience almost entire, and the skilled labor and money required for this purpose will be considerable.

The foregoing observations are not presented as my theory of the matter, or from any personal objection to removing to the Pension building. They are the result of the past experience of the bureau in a somewhat similar position. Congress caused the Bureau of Education to be moved from the present building to a joint occupancy with the Pension Office of the building on the corner of Twelfth street and Pennsylvania avenue eleven years ago.

The Pension Office then, as now, was the first occupant of the building, and the quarters assigned to this bureau were so inadequate in extent, inconvenient of access, and unsuited for its work, that practically no efficient work was done by this bureau during the year that the joint tenancy lasted. The growth of the Pension Office forced the bureau out of this unwelcome and disastrous connection, and Congress removed it back to its present quarters, the two changes of location costing somewhat more than the present rent of this building for one year. The Twelfth street building, like the present Pension Building, consisted of large rooms on each floor, suitable, perhaps, for the large divisions and sections of the Pension Office, but absolutely destructive to the repose, the quiet, and the seclusion found essential to the proper performance of duty in the Bureau of Education. The construction of the present Pension Building, the great number of employés already housed therein, and the very large number proposed to be added thereto by the transfer of the offices named at the beginning of this letter, will repeat and doubtless aggravate the history of that change.

Another aspect of the relations of this bureau to its work would not occur to the ordinary thinker. This bureau was established chiefly for the purpose of informing the teachers and people of the United States as to the things most useful for the promotion of public and other education. The performance of this duty has made it proper to open the library and museum of the office to persons interested in education, but not connected with the bureau, and such persons under present circumstances, subject to proper regulations, have made frequent and valuable use thereof.

If the bureau and its collections are to be moved to a building where the necessities of another kind of service render access to the library and museum of this office difficult or uncertain, the use of them by persons not connected with the bureau would necessarily be prevented.

I would invite your attention to the wise and liberal action of Congress a few years ago in behalf of the Surgeon-General's Office, when a specially-constructed building for the medical library and medical museum attached thereto was authorized. By this measure the great working tools of that magnificent bureau were put into a condition for the most effective use both by that office and by those for whom that office chiefly labors. The reasons that justified the construction of that building are equally cogent for the permanent and suitable lodgment of the Bureau of Education separate from other offices of dissimilar size and purpose.

The Wright Building, now occupied by the bureau, on the corner of Eighth and G streets northwest, is situated very near the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and close to lines of cars by which persons desiring to visit it for consultation and study may have easy access, and yet the location is one sufficiently quiet and retired to allow the work of the office to be done in comfort and with considerable efficiency. Though too small for the present needs of the bureau, it can be made to serve for some time longer by judicious use of the space at hand. It contains about 11,000 square feet and has a basement and four other stories.

Briefly described, the basement is for the storage of fuel and the documents of the office; the first story is used by the statistical division; the second floor by the Commissioner, chief clerk, and the record division; and the third floor by the library and the clerks employed in connection therewith, while the upper floor is devoted to the museum.

It will be seen that the constructive divisions of the building correspond to the administrative divisions of the office, while the six rooms on each floor permit that subdivision and seclusion which the nature of the work requires. In case of the removal of the bureau to the Pension building there is no possibility of securing even an equal floor space, a reduction of which would be disastrous to the bureau in every conceivable way.

If any change is made at all the one dictated by a regard for the purpose and usefulness of the bureau would be to provide it with a building specially adapted for the care and proper storage and use of its valuable collections, and the efficient service of its employés, and until such a change is made it would seem wise, economical, and expedient to let it remain in its present quarters.

For these reasons and those stated in the joint report of the Commissioners above mentioned I would respectfully urge you to use your influence to have the order of Congress requiring the removal of this bureau to the Pension building revoked and a suitable provision made in the appropriation bills for the retention of it in its present quarters.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. H. R. DAWSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.

MEMORIAL OF THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

The department of superintendence of the National Educational Association, in session at San Francisco, July 17–20, 1888, adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas the Bureau of Education at Washington City has been the means of rendering efficient service in the cause of popular education in the United States and of collecting the largest educational library in the world, as well as one of the most complete pædagogical museums; and

Whereas those collections are now preserved in rented rooms wholly inadequate to meet the growing demands of the bureau: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That in order still to further the work for which the bureau was organized, this body, representing all of the States and Territories, here assembled does most respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to erect a suitable building to be used exclusively for the benefit of the Bureau of Education; and

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a request that the same may be laid before the bodies over which they respectively preside.

A brief history.

The National Educational Association was organized at Philadelphia in 1857, under the name of the National Teachers' Association, by leading teachers from various sections of the country. James L. Enos was chairman of the first meeting, William E. Sheldon its first secretary, and A. J. Rickoff its first treasurer.

The name was changed in 1870 to National Educational Association.

The association has held twenty-seven meetings, as follows: Two at Philadelphia, 1857, 1879; one at Cincinnati, 1858; Washington, 1859; Buffalo, 1860; Chicago, 1863; Ogdensburgh, 1864; Harrisburgh, 1865; Indianapolis, 1866; Nashville, 1868; Trenton, 1869; Cleveland, 1870; St. Louis, 1871; Boston, 1872; Elmira, 1873; Detroit, 1874; Minneapolis, 1875; Baltimore, 1876; Louisville, 1877; Chautauqua, 1880; Atlanta, 1881; three at Saratoga, 1882, 1883, 1885; Madison, 1884; Topeka, 1886; Chicago, 1887.

There were no meetings in 1861, 1862, 1867, 1878.

It was incorporated in the District of Columbia February 24, 1885.

Board of trustees.

N. A. Calkins, chairman, 124 East Eightieth street, New York; Zalmon Richards, secretary, 1301 Corcoran street, Washington, D. C.; John Eaton, Marietta, Ohio (term expires July, 1891); N. A. Calkins, New York (term expires July, 1890); H. S. Tarbell, Providence, R. I. (term expires July, 1889); Zalmon Richards, Washington, D. C. (term expires July, 1888); Aaron Gove, Denver, Colo., ex officio.

Its objects.

"To elevate the character and advance the interests of the profession of teaching, and to promote the cause of popular education in the United States."

Departments.

The following departments are organized within this association:

Department officers.

I. The national council of education (composed of sixty members elected from the association).—J. L. Pickard, president, Iowa City, Iowa; C. C. Rounds, vice-president, Plymouth, N. H.; E. W. Coy, secretary, Cincinnati, Ohio.

II. Kindergarten.—Eudora Hailmann, president, La Porte, Ind.; Eva B. Whitmore, vice-president, Chicago, Ill.; Alpha A. Smith, secretary, Fayette, Iowa.

III. Elementary.—Leroy D. Brown, president, Reno, Nev.; Agnes L. Rounds, vice-president, Cambridge, Mass.; J. L. Lamson, secretary, Nashville, Tenn.

IV. Secondary.—Samuel Thurber, president, Boston, Mass.; A. F. Nightingale, vice-president, Lake View, Ill.; Paul H. Hanus, secretary, Denver, Colo.

V. Higher.—B. A. Hinsdale, president, Cleveland, Ohio.; Alice E. Palmer, vice-president, Cambridge, Mass.; T. C. McBride, secretary, Iowa City, Iowa.

VI. Normal.—S. S. Parr, president, Greencastle, Ind; R. C. Norton, vice-president, Cape Girardeau, Mo.; Rose C. Swartz, secretary, Oshkosh, Wis.

VII. Superintendence.—N. C. Dougherty, president, Peoria, Ill.; Henry A. Wise, first vice-president, Baltimore, Md.; J. G. Scofield, second vice-president, Seneca, Kans.; W. R. Thigpen, secretary, Savannah, Ga.

VIII. Industrial.—George T. Fairchild, president, Manhattan, Kans.; H. M. Liepsiger, vice-president, New York City; R. S. Thompson, secretary.

IX. Art.—George H. Bartlett, president, Boston, Mass.; Josephine Locke, vice-president, St. Louis, Mo.; Eben Rose, secretary, Rochester, N. Y.
X. Music.—N. Coe Stewart, president, Cleveland, Ohio; Herbert L. Griggs, vice-president, Denver, Colo.; Edgar A. Silver, secretary, Boston, Mass.

Mr. ALLISON. The next item, which in view of the debate yesterday I will only state, is the proviso respecting scrubby timber, etc. Senators will understand what that is. The amendment was a limitation put on by the Senate to the appropriation for the examination of timber lands.

The next item is the amendment 119, "Reservoirs for the storage of water." The House conferees were very persistent in their opposition to that amendment.

Then there are two other amendments about which the House seemed to be very persistent, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. Those are amendments numbered 222 and 223. They are amendments in the nature of legislation respecting prosecutions under the internal revenue laws. They insist that there shall be certain limitations, namely:

And no part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any fees to United States commissioners, marshals, or clerks for any warrant issued or arrest made, or other fees in prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws, unless the prosecution has been—

Then the Senate struck out the words which I am about to read—commenced upon a sworn statement setting forth the facts constituting the offense and alleging them to be within the personal knowledge of the affiant, or upon sworn complaint by a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue or revenue agent, setting forth the facts upon information and belief and—

Then we retained the words—approved either before or after such arrest by—

We then struck out these words—

a circuit or district judge or—the attorney of the United States in the district where the offense is alleged to have been committed or the prosecution is by indictment.

And retained the remainder of the clause, as follows—

Those who are administering the internal-revenue system say that this is a great detriment to the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws, and the Senate struck those provisions out of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I wish in this connection to say that I quite agree with the Internal-Revenue Department that they are extremely injurious to the administration of the law as it is. They are merely a section, a part of a full judicial bill, a crimes bill, that the House passed upon the subject and that is now under consideration in the Committee on the Judiciary of this body; and I am bound to suspect, with great respect to the House of Representatives (as on this conference report I have a right to allude to their action), that finding it would not be easy to get a bill which destroys the whole efficiency, as we thought, of the internal-revenue system, through the Senate on the report of its Judiciary Committee, it was thought extremely desirable to accomplish the end in some way by riding it on an appropriation bill in order to get it through in that way.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad to have the Senator from Vermont explain at least what would be the effect of these provisions if we should agree to them.

The next important series of amendments are those amendments which relate to the Library Committee, and I am sorry not to see the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] in his seat, who has charge of those important subjects. The House of Representatives disagree to the entire line and range of amendments which we proposed respecting the purchase of works of art, the completion of the Catalogue of the Congressional Library, the purchase of historical papers from B. F. Stevens, the purchase of the library of Professor Arnold Guyot, the purchase of the unfinished painting of the commissioners of the treaty of 1783, by Benjamin West, etc.

The next important question is the series of amendments relating to public printing. We increased $160,000 the appropriation for public printing, the House appropriation being, I think, some $300,000 less than the estimate; I have not the exact figures in my mind. We increased the appropriation $160,000. The House has disagreed to that thus far, and it seems to me that the appropriation made by the Senate will be found to be insufficient; in other words, the additions that we made will not carry the public printing which has been ordered by Congress through this fiscal year; and therefore it is inevitable that, whether they finally agree to our amendments or we recede from them, there will be a deficiency of from $100,000 to $500,000 in our public printing during the current year, or else the printing will not be done, one or the other, and most likely both will happen, because there is a large amount of printing ordered by Congress in the last two or three years still unexecuted. Of course the Senate conferees can yield to the claim of the House in this regard.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether a large part of the increase mentioned as to the appropriations for the Public Printing Office was not occasioned by the extension of the leaves of absence to the employés from fifteen to thirty days, which comes necessarily out of the amount appropriated for the work?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, Mr. President, and I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to that. Here they say the Senate increases these appropriation bills. The House allowed $90,000 in this bill for fifteen days' leave of absence for the employés of the Public Printing Office. Then a law was passed extending the fifteen days to thirty days, requiring a doubling of that appropriation, so that in obedience to the law the Committee on Appropriations added $90,000 to the House provision, making a total of $180,000, so that this $90,000 was added in the Senate in pursuance of a law which passed Congress, and it is necessary of course in order to execute that law.

As I was about to say, we can recede from these amendments, but if we do we shall be confronted with a deficiency at the next session of Congress of from $150,000 to $500,000.

So the House disagreed to our provision respecting the purchase of a site for the city post-office building——

Mr. REAGAN. Before the Senate gets away from the increase for the Government Printing Office, I desire to say that that $180,000 appropriated by Congress was but a bid by the two parties in Congress for the labor vote of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Texas puts that in a very terse way. I merely stated the fact, and of course if the Senator interprets it as he does, that is all very well for him. I did not know that the Republican party was engaged in any particular method of bidding for votes. I thought that was reserved for the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. REAGAN. Both parties are doing these things to a shameful extent.

Mr. ALLISON. I was not aware of that. Of course I quite agree with the Senator respecting his own party. [Laughter.]

The next item is the establishment of a zoological park, $200,000. Of course the House conferees disagree to that. They seem to share rather the view of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], that if we were to have a zoological garden we ought to have it in the mountains, and inasmuch as we had 60 miles square of ground in the neighborhood of the Yellowstone Park set apart and devoted to the growth of wild animals we had better dedicate a portion of that to a zoological garden. The Senate conferees did not take that view.

They also object to the purchase of Battery Island.

In response to the Senator from Vermont, who asked me respecting the city post-office building——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know on what ground it is?

Mr. ALLISON. We were unable to ascertain, I think, really any ground, except a general statement that there were two or three other places in this city where land could be purchased more cheaply than this would be in the neighborhood of the Post-Office Department and the Interior Department proposed to be purchased by our amendment. They seem to think that if we should go down below Pennsylvania avenue, where it is necessary, I am told, to drive piles 40 feet in order to get a foundation, we might erect a public building there which would be suitable for a city post-office. However, that has not been fully disposed of.

Mr. BECK. We are going to have a great deal more talk about that, and the Senate had better tell us what to do. The Senate conferees are all agreed, I believe, and earnestly in favor of taking the square between Eighth and Ninth and E and F streets. Suggestions were made to go south of Pennsylvania avenue. Some other sites were suggested, such as Judiciary Square. Still other suggestions were made in regard to the square between Fifth and Sixth and D and E streets, facing Judiciary Square.

Mr. ALLISON. And part of the park also.

Mr. BECK. Part of the park also. I desire to say that there was no definite suggestion made that we could agree upon any more than we could upon the one we ourselves proposed; and I desire to say to the Senate that I believe, after thorough investigation, as far as I am able to make out, the square we propose is by far the best for all purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No doubt of that at all.

Mr. BECK. We could continue the Post-Office Department building from its present location, closing Eighth street between E and F and extending to Ninth, and have the city post-office located there. That is the most convenient point for such a building by reason of the railways running along F street, Seventh street, and Ninth street; and by erecting a five-story building there, and perhaps ultimately adding a story or two to the present Post-Office Department building, we could not only accommodate the city post-office, the Post-Office Department proper, and the overflow of the Interior Department, but have two creditable buildings there side by side.

Suggestions have been made, and the newspapers are full of such statements, that men were lobbying about for these particular sites. I desire to put upon record the statement that during all the time the subcommittee and the whole Committee on Appropriations were considering this question and in conference no human being came near any of us, as I am advised. Certainly none came to me——

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly I was not approached in that way.

Mr. BECK. And the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations says no one ever came to the committee inquiring about it. I do not now know the name of a man who owns a foot of that ground, but in the public interest I think the Senate ought to tell its conferees that until something else can be agreed upon we ought to insist upon that square, and hold to it as long as we can.

Mr. VEST. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I do not know whether I am disarranging the order of his explanation or not, but I want to ask what became of that provision of the bill as it passed the House which provided for the temporary location of the city post-office in the Pension Bureau building?

Mr. ALLISON. That was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I must be permitted to say, then, that that gives away this whole question.

Mr. ALLISON. That was given away by the Senate, then, and not by the conferees. That is one of the things that have passed into history. It was agreed to by the Senate a long time ago.

Mr. BECK. And on the recommendation of the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. VEST. I went before the Committee on Appropriations and remonstrated against it and did all I could as a Senator to defeat that arrangement, which is the worst that I have ever known in this city. It defaces the Pension Bureau building; it insures the presence of a mob there from morning till night, and altogether there is not one solitary argument, with due respect to the heads of those Departments, given in its favor thus far. Of course if that is adopted, that is a strong argument in favor of not doing anything as to purchasing a site for a city post-office. For nearly ten years I have urged the purchase of the square already spoken of, and I want to say that it is an open secret that as long as the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in the other House is constituted as it now is you can not purchase that square. They never will agree to a bill for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say to the Senator, as I have looked over this question with some care, that I believe it would be wise to expend $200,000 or $300,000 in an additional public building which is necessary not only for the city post-office but for the Post-Office Department itself, which is a rapidly growing department, and also for the Interior Department; and these purposes require a location in that neighborhood, and I believe the square proposed by our amendment is a good site. But I do not agree with him that the temporary location of the city post-office in the rotunda, or whatever that place is called, in the Pension Office building will interfere with the general consideration of the subject.

Mr. VEST. Let us understand each other, Mr. President. I understand that that arrangement in regard to the Pension Bureau building was entirely antagonistic to the purchase of the square opposite the Interior Department and to the General Post-Office Department; and we know very well—if the Senator does not know it, and he is a much older Senator than I am, I know it as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—if you ever make an arrangement of that kind it will become permanent, and you will never get the city post-office out of that building—never. That is one of the questions I do not propose myself to waste any more time about.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator may be right about that, but nevertheless that is one of the questions on which we have not yet agreed.

I believe I have gone over in a general way the differences between the two Houses upon this bill; but I do not wish to allow this opportunity to pass without making some general observations upon all these bills.

It is a singular thing, Mr. President, that we have reached the 28th day of August or nearly two months in the fiscal year for which we are appropriating money, and yet we have not reached a conclusion upon this, one of the most important appropriation bills, and I want to say that I regard it as in no sense the fault of the Senate Committee on Appropriations or of the Senate. Under the uniform custom of the two Houses for years, indeed from the foundation of the Government, the House of Representatives has originated practically the general appropriation bills; and as soon as the Senate could get hold of them under this arrangement, we have considered these bills as rapidly as it was possible to consider them. In their consideration the Senate is constantly subjected to the criticism that we are largely increasing the appropriations.

I have shown how we increased this sundry civil bill; that the increases were made because of laws that were passed after the bill passed the House, because of the importunities of heads of Departments stating to us in print and in writing and verbally that the amounts given by the House were insufficient to carry on the operations of the Government. I saw it stated the other day in a place which I suppose I am not permitted to mention, that the Senate had this year swollen the appropriations $19,000,000. In view of that I propose to review briefly not only this appropriation bill but all the bills, as respects these increases, and see what there is in that statement. That statement was made by a distinguished Representative from the State of Texas in arguing some question pertinent to what I am saying. Now, I shall go over these bills in brief.

We increased the agricultural appropriation bill $119,000 over its amount as it passed the House. The House itself increased the bill nearly $600,000 over the estimates of the Department. Why? The Department did not estimate for the agricultural colleges at all. There was an item of $585,000 in the estimates omitted from the bill. That $585,000 was added in the House. We added $100,000 for sorghum experiments and $18,000 for experiments in grasses in high altitudes. I submit that these were proper appropriations.

The next addition was made on the Army appropriation bill, wherein in this body there was added to the bill some $6,000,000 beyond what was appropriated in the House. Why was that done? It was done on the motion of the Committee on Military Affairs of this body, I might say upon the joint motion of the Military Committee and the Committee on Coast Defenses.

They believed then that no fortification bill would pass at this session, because when this Army appropriation bill was considered in the House of Representatives no fortification bill had been reported to the House, although a month of this fiscal year had passed away. Therefore they said unless something is done in the nature of appropriations for coast defenses upon the Army bill—and it was a perfectly legitimate amendment to put upon the Army bill in this body; this body can not fairly consider or take into consideration the rules of the House of Representatives, which gives jurisdiction of a part of that subject to one committee and another part of it to another—the subject will go without action. So we added some $6,000,000 to the Army bill for coast defenses, using a general term and designation only, without specifying the particular objects of the appropriation. We put that on the Army bill and, as I said, put it on before the fortification bill had been proposed in the House. Since that time, however, the fortification bill has not only been reported in the House, but it has passed the House, carrying nearly $4,000,000 of appropriation.

If that fortification bill shall pass here even as it passed the House, without the addition of a single dollar to it, the amendments which we put in the Senate on the Army bill will of course be given away, surrendered, and there will be no addition to the appropriations made in the Senate as compared with the House on that account. The House in the fortification bill provides for only a million and a half dollars' worth of steel forgings. The Senate amendments to the Army bill provided for $5,000,000 worth, and as agreed to in conference for three and a half millions, making a difference of two millions as now disclosed in these two bills. Therefore this addition is an addition which should not be counted as against the Senate now that the fortification bill has passed the House and will be considered in the Senate.

The increase in the District of Columbia bill is $855,000. Why? Because it was represented to the Committee on Appropriations that it was absolutely necessary, owing to the rapid growth of this city, that we should expend some three or four hundred thousand dollars for school-houses in this District, and the great amount of the increase in the District of Columbia bill was for school-houses and sewers and additional water supply, and every Senator knows how greatly all these are needed in this city.

On the Indian appropriation bill there was a slight reduction made by the Senate.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill we increased $203,000. Why? That entire increase was made in one Department and on account of the establishment of another. After the legislative bill passed the House of Representatives the two Houses passed a department of labor bill, converted the Bureau of Labor into a department of labor; and whilst the original appropriation bill as it came from the House contained an appropriation of forty-odd thousand dollars for the Bureau of Labor, the law provided for an enlargement, so that we were compelled in pursuance of that law to add over $60,000 to that appropriation.

The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions came to us and said that it was necessary for the prompt conduct of the pension business that there should be a slight increase of the clerical force of the Pension Bureau, and we added it. The Commissioner of Patents, which is a self-sustaining department, also had added a few clerks in the Patent Office, which were afterwards, I believe, given up. So these small additions were additions made because of new laws.

Now I come to the pension appropriation bill. We increased in this body the pension appropriation bill $1,476,000. Why? Because the House of Representatives had inserted a provision respecting the widows of soldiers, providing that they should draw pensions from the date of the death of the husband instead of from the date of the application; and the Secretary of the Interior sent to us an estimate showing that if that provision was passed, even as modified by the Senate, it would require $1,476,000 to pay such pensions for the current fiscal year. So we added in the Senate $1,476,000 to the pension bill, the House of Representatives itself having added $4,000,000 to the estimates, because, curiously enough, in making the estimates for this year the Department did not provide for the Mexican war pensions, and the House of Representatives added $4,000,000 to the estimates because of that.

Now I come to the Post-Office appropriation bill. The House made fair appropriations in that bill. I see the Senator from Texas [Mr.

REAGAN] in my eye and I must call his attention to the fact that between the time the Post-Office bill passed the House and the time it passed the Senate a law was enacted providing that no letter-carrier in any city where there was a free-delivery system should be required to work more than eight hours a day; and under that provision, which became a separate and independent statute, the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury asked us to add $1,021,000 to the appropriations, making that as a necessary estimate for the execution of that law. So that increase was an increase made necessary by a statute passed by Congress and approved by the President of the United States.

Now take the river and harbor bill. I do not care to speak of that, because the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who has it in charge knows very well how that bill is treated; but I will dwell long enough to say of the river and harbor bill that the one passed this year is only the second such bill that has been passed in four years. The only other river and harbor bill which became a law during the administration of President Cleveland, two years ago, was a bill of $14,000,000. It is true that the Secretary of War only estimated for $10,000,000 for this purpose, but the Chief of Engineers estimated that $40,000,000 could be economically expended. Therefore, when the two Houses came to consider the great question of the improvement of our rivers and our harbors they were confronted with the statement of the Chief of Engineers that $40,000,000 could be economically expended and with the fact that for two years there had been no appropriation and that these appropriations were necessary to carry on existing works and supply new national works. So $22,000,000 were included in the river and harbor bill, or $12,000,000 more than is found in the Book of Estimates.

I will state also that last year, when the Congress ended, on the 4th day of March, 1887, we adjourned with a deficiency bill hanging between the two Houses, so that it was necessary when this session began that there should be an urgent deficiency bill to cover, not the expenditures of the year 1888, but the necessary expenditures of the fiscal year 1887, and that added $4,000,000 immediately to the expenditures; and there was also a deficiency for the collection of customs amounting to $450,000.

Mr. President, having made this review, showing that the additions made in the Senate were additions that were necessary because of laws, because of the urgent persistency of heads of Departments, and because of recommendations that came to us in the form of supplemental estimates, now we are told that we have largely increased the appropriations of this year beyond those of last year. I agree to that, Mr. President. I agree that our appropriations this year are largely in excess of those of last year. Now, let me go a little further to see why this is.

Last year a river and harbor bill passed both Houses which appropriated some $12,000,000; and if that bill had become a law, instead of having a river and harbor bill of $22,000,000 this year we should have had a river and harbor bill of perhaps only $11,000,000 or $12,000,000. In other words by the failure of the President of the United States to approve the river and harbor bill of last year, the Democratic party, if you please, or those who make careful study of the expenditures of the year were able to say that the appropriations were reduced that much.

Not only that, but notwithstanding the appropriations were made last year, as was supposed sufficient to carry on the operations of the Government for the fiscal year which recently expired, it is shown by deficiency bills which have passed both Houses in the nature of urgent deficiencies and by a general deficiency bill which has passed the House of Representatives and will soon lie upon your table, that we fell short last year of appropriating money enough to carry on this Government by $14,000,000. In other words, although the appropriations of last year were supposed to be sufficient, this economical Administration has found it necessary to expend $14,000,000 during the last fiscal year in addition to the appropriations made for that year and also to expend $4,000,000 which should be carried over to 1887.

If you add to that $14,000,000 the $4,000,000 you have $18,000,000, and if you add the $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 in the river and harbor bill, which ought to have been expended last year and is fairly chargeable to last year's expenditures, you have a total of $30,000,000 which has been drawn in and forced, as it were, into the appropriations of this current fiscal year.

Therefore when you come to account for the large appropriations of this year as compared with last, you must take into consideration the fact that last year we did not appropriate as the law and as good economical administration of our Government required us to appropriate. Take a single illustration. One year ago last October the Supreme Court of the United States decided against this Government what was called the Choctaw claim. Under the laws of our country, from the day of that decision that judgment drew 5 per cent. interest. Why should the Government with $100,000,000 in its Treasury allow the owners of that judgment, whoever they may be, to have it drawing 5 per cent. interest for a year and a half? If that money was to be appropriated at all, it ought to have been appropriated during the session which ended in March a year ago. The Senate did appropriate for it, but it was struck out elsewhere.

At this session one of the first things that was necessary to be done and that was done by the House of Representatives, which refused to make this appropriation last year so as to save interest, was to make an appropriation in the Indian appropriation bill of over $3,000,000 for the purpose of paying that judgment and paying interest on it for a year and a half at the rate of 5 per cent., when the Government of the United States could borrow money if it needed it at 2½ per cent., and when we have in the Treasury over $100,000,000.

Mr. President, I make these statements with respect to the appropriations for the purpose of making a comparison. I have here a table carefully prepared by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations showing the appropriations in detail of this year, and I shall ask at the conclusion of my remarks that this table may be inserted in the RECORD as part of them.

Mr. BECK. Does that give last year as well as this?

Mr. ALLISON. This table, as the Senator will see in a few moments, not only gives last year, but it goes clear back to 1882, and I will explain the table somewhat.

The appropriations of this year I have given in detail, estimating the fortification bill. I want to show the Senate that I am within bounds. I have estimated the fortification bill at only $3,725,000, just as it passed the House of Representatives, without adding to it.

Mr. BECK. What have you done with the additions made to the Army bill?

Mr. ALLISON. As to the additions made to the Army bill, I have assumed in this table that if the fortification bill shall pass all the amendments that were added upon the Army bill by the Senate relating to coast defense and gun manufacture will be withdrawn. Therefore I place in this as respects the Army the exact appropriation made by the House of Representatives, because, barring the additions that we made, which are fairly covered by the fortification bill, we did not increase the appropriations for the Army.

Mr. BECK. There is one bill that it is very hard to make the country understand and the Senate understand, and that is the Post-Office bill. Will the Senator please explain that?

Mr. ALLISON. I will come to that. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to it.

The Army bill in this estimate is the Army bill as it passed the House of Representatives. I want to have it borne in mind that it is the Army bill denuded of the amendments that we put on here, which properly and fairly belonged to the fortification bill, and which will be included in the fortification bill. Yet I have only estimated for the fortification bill the exact amount appropriated by the House.

Thus every regular appropriation is included except the bill which we have now under consideration, and I must admit that I have made an estimate as to what will be finally agreed to in this bill, and therefore to that extent the table is inaccurate; that is to say it is inaccurate by the possibility of a difference between about $27,000,000 and $25,000,000, depending upon who surrenders this or that appropriation which is disagreed to in this conference report. Looking at the probabilities, I have estimated it at $26,300,000. Then I have added the deficiencies as the deficiency bill was reported to the House of Representatives, which is practically as it passed the House yesterday, although I believe $100,000 or $200,000 have been added to it by the House.

So in making up this table I have taken the actual appropriations and made estimates within a very narrow range as respects the fortification bill and the sundry civil bill. Now, taking all this into account and also estimating within a very narrow range, the public-building bills and the other bills yet to be passed—estimating them at only two million and a half, whilst there is fully that amount pending now in conference committee upon public-building bills alone—the total of this year's appropriations, not including what are called the permanent appropriations, amounts to $306,392,296.93. For the same purposes last year the appropriations were $248,573,990.84, or nearly $58,000,000 less than the appropriations for this year. I have explained in a sense a good many of these items of increase.

Mr. BECK. The deficiencies and the river and harbor bill account for $40,000,000 of the difference.

Mr. ALLISON. The river and harbor bill and the deficiencies, as the Senator from Kentucky suggests, account for a little more than $40,000,000 of this difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAY in the chair). The Senator from Iowa will pause while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that that order be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Iowa finishes his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the unfinished business will be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose this is in order even against the regular order. A conference report is a privileged question, I take it.

Now, Mr. President, if you will add to the $306,000,000 what are known as the permanent appropriations, that is, those appropriations which are not drawn into annual appropriation bills, which amount to $115,000,000 per annum, we have a total of $421,000,000 of appropriations for this current year, and we have an estimated revenue of $440,000,000.

These two estimates include what the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] called my attention to a moment ago, namely, a full appropriation for the Post-Office Department, and include the postal revenues in the revenues estimated. In the $421,000,000 of expenditures I have included the total expenditures of the Post-Office Department and in estimating the revenues for the current fiscal year I have included the total revenues of the Post-Office Department and all other revenues. One offsets the other. Thus, according to this statement, which is substantially correct, the appropriations for this current year will be within $19,000,000 of the estimated revenues of the current year.

I have gone into these detailed explanations of the expenditures for the purpose of expressing my own judgment, not binding anybody else, that in the main these appropriations are necessary for the purpose of carrying on the Government; that they are not wasteful appropriations, but that they are in the main proper. I speak by and large of the whole sum. They are in the main appropriations that are necessary to carry on this great Government of ours; and therefore, when I show that our revenues are only in excess of our expenditures for this year $19,000,000, I do not stand here for the purpose of criticising the expenditures or the appropriations made; and this table, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, takes a range of eight years, beginning with 1882 and ending with 1889, covering the current fiscal year, because the appropriation bills are now so far advanced that we know practically what they will be.

Now I want to call attention to the fact that comparing four years of the administration of President Arthur with four years of the administration of President Cleveland the excess of appropriations for the last four years as compared with the former four amounts to $95,303,053.57. In other words, we have appropriated for President Cleveland's administration $95,000,000 in four years more than we appropriated for four years of Republican administration immediately preceding him. I am not here either to criticise the appropriations of four years ago or those of the recent four years, but only to say that when men criticise these appropriations as they have been criticised hitherto, and when a man has stood in this Chamber honored, respected, and revered by us for twelve long years, goes on the hustings this very year, and within a week says that these appropriations are monstrous appropriations, I think it is time that the men who make them should be able to show why they are made and the men who criticise them should be able to show wherein they are monstrous and extravagant and wasteful.

Mr. BECK. Who was that?

Mr. ALLISON. Our "Old Roman," who made this statement the other day at Cheltenham Beach, at Chicago, that the appropriations that were yearly being made by Congress were monstrous. We know with what vigor and energy he would make that statement to an audience of forty thousand people, whirling around in order that they might hear him.

Mr. President, if we are making these monstrous appropriations, we have made $95,000,000 more from 1885 to 1889 than we did from 1881 to 1885. They are appropriations to carry on this Government. They are appropriations that have passed the scrutiny not only of the Republicans in both Houses, but of the Democrats as well, and I mean to say here now, and I think I can say it without fear of successful contradiction, that in the Committee on Appropriations of this body as respects these appropriations there have been no party divisions, the Democrats and Republicans alike making the best possible investigation that they could of these long and detailed items of public expenditure, and then coming to a resolution and conclusion without division or distinction of party.

So I have felt that here and now it was incumbent on me at this first opportunity after these criticisms to make some suggestions respecting the situation of the appropriation bills.

I ask that this table to which I have alluded be added to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to that suggestion.

The table is as follows:

†This is the amount of fortification bill for 1889, as passed the House of Representatives.

§This is the amount of general deficiency bill as reported to the House of Representatives.

‖This amount ($2,500,000) covers various bills pending for miscellaneous purposes, and is approximated.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, one by one the illusions about the present Administration fade; one by one its pretensions are exploded. The speech of the Senator from Iowa, who has just taken his seat, which is a complete mine of information as to appropriations and expenditures, has exploded the assumption that the present Administration is an economical one. An Administration that in four years requires appropriations of the people's money in excess of the previous four years under the opposing party, of ninety-five odd millions of dollars, has little claim to be considered economical in its expenditure of the people's money. And yet, sir, there is no one thing that for four years has been so persistently urged before the American people, in Congress and out, in the newspapers and upon the stump, as the assertion that the present Administration is frugal, is economical, is simple in its way of expending the public revenue.

The Senator from Iowa, more competent than any one in this body from his long experience, the grasp that he has upon the subject of appropriations, the scrutiny that he must needs give and does give to every appropriation that passes Congress, has shown clearly how the present Administration stands upon the subject of the appropriations that it requires as compared with four years of its predecessor.

No fairer method could have been taken than that pursued by the Senator from Iowa, as illustrated in the table he has submitted. To compare this year with last, or to compare this year with any single year of President Arthur's administration, would not be fair; it would not represent the whole situation. As the Senator from Iowa has said, and as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], an old veteran upon the subject of appropriation, has brought out, millions of appropriations have been crowded into this year that ought to have gone to the account of and been charged against last year; and it would not be fair to hold the Administration up to censure because the appropriations that it requires for this year are so large as to amount to $306,000,000.

But the Senator from Iowa has not stopped there. He has gone back and grouped the appropriations that have been required by this Administration, for Senators will remember and the country will remember that whatever may be the appropriations, taking them by and large, we are never able to keep up with the estimates that are sent in here from the Departments. No matter how much money may be appropriated, no matter what it may be in excess of the appropriation of a prior year, it is the general rule that the requests which are made for appropriations exceed the expenditures, and in these four years, reaching from 1885 to 1889, inclusive, as compared with the four years preceding, there is the enormous discrepancy of $95,000,000 and odd against the present Administration. Almost every department of the Government costs the people to-day and has for the last four years more than in the preceding four years.

It is interesting to follow these things through and to see how it is that gradually, while the cry of economy and frugality and old Democratic simplicity has been kept up, at the same time there has gone on constantly and unerringly an increase in the appropriations and expenditures of the General Government. Each Department almost makes good this rule. The agricultural appropriation has been increased; the diplomatic appropriation has been increased; the Indian appropriation has been increased; the legislative appropriation, the running expenses of the Government have been increased; the navy bill has been increased; the sundry civil bill has been increased. The miscellaneous appropriations which go to cover claims and subjects outside of the regular appropriation bills have been increased 50 per cent. over the appropriations which were made and consumed of the people's money by the administration of the Republicans eight years ago. And so it goes on until this aggregate has been reached.

Now, Mr. President, it is a fortunate thing that the Senator from Iowa has brought to the attention of the Senate and of the country these most important facts. It was high time that one of the pretenses under which this Administration sailed before the American people should be destroyed. It is no new thing. One after the other, as I have said, these illusions disappear, these pretenses are exploded.

For a time the Administration sailed under the pretext that it was a civil service reform administration. Investigation and examination showed that whatever had been the evils under old administrations they were ten times increased under the present Administration. There was never an administration that made wholesale and sweeping removals like this. There was never an administration that prostituted its office-holding force to the uses of party politics like this. There has never been illustrated or shown in the history of the Government any such instance of the power of an administration being used to break down malcontents and protestants in the Democratic party as has been shown by this civil service reform Administration.

Testimony taken by a committee of the Senate, of which I have the honor to be chairman, shows that in the State of Pennsylvania discipline was resorted to by the national Administration, every power of the Government was brought to bear to break down the resisting force against the Administration and its theories inside of its party in the person of Mr. RANDALL. Nothing that could be brought to bear in the way of patronage but was bestowed to pay men in terms for deserting the standard of Mr. RANDALL so that the Administration might control the party organization in that State. It was shown that in the assessing and in the collecting of money for political purposes, in turning post-offices and custom-houses into sluice-ways through which might run contributions for party purposes, nothing had ever been equal to it; and yet upon the heels of that the President issued a new order, which I hold in my hand, in which he declared that the civil-service rules must be enforced with greater strength and with greater rigor, as if that would be a remedy!

Take another subject where the pretenses of the Administration have been exposed. It negotiated a treaty with a view not of settling the difficulties that had arisen upon the fisheries question. The discussion that lasted here for weeks and weeks showed that not one person engaged in this interest anywhere was willing to admit that the treaty met the difficulties of the case, and the general feeling of the American people when the discussion ended was that it had been demonstrated that the rights of the United States had been given away in the treaty. We do not know yet the damage that has been done by the Administration in negotiating that treaty, although it was rejected by the Senate. We do not know how, in future negotiations, in times to come, when this Administration is dead and buried and forgotten, the concession that was made by the Administration in that treaty will come back to pester us. And after this treaty had been rejected, then the President comes in with a message assuming new ground upon the basis that had been agreed on this side as a remedy.

Here we have another trick of the Administration exposed. The Senator from Iowa has shown that in the use of the people's money in the appropriations that are made at the request of this Administration, claiming to be a frugal and economical administration, it expends in four years of the people's money which is appropriated for it $95,000,000 more than its predecessor in the same period of time.

What will be the remedy for this? What will be the Administration remedy for this? When this exposure has been made, when this explosion is heard by the country, what will be the remedy by the Administration for it? Will it spend any less money? Not one dollar. Will it economize in any one of the Departments? Not one. Will it reduce its force of paid mercenaries who have been increased all along the line? Not in a single person. Will it in any way economize and save money, and ask for less appropriations? No, sir, in not a single instance; but the remedy will be after this exposure, after this explosion, after this showing up of false pretenses, that we shall be treated to a message from the President of the United States in which he will declare that there must be more economy, and perhaps will take the ground that we ought to pay out less money for the interest on the national debt, and to the soldiers and their widows and their orphan children. That is the only remedy. It would be in part and in parcel and in character with the remedies resorted to whenever any pretenses of the Administration have been exposed.

I wanted, as the subject was brought up and as illustrating the economy of the administration of the Democratic party while in power, to recur for a minute to the public buildings. I have got here, not complete, but so far as I could gather them, a little batch of Presidential vetoes upon public buildings. The first that strikes me is a bill passed by Congress providing for a building in Allentown, Pa., at an expense of $100,000—a town in a Northern State, a Republican State, containing at the last census 18,063 population, largely increased at the present time. The next that I find is a veto message of a bill passed by Congress for a public building to cost $75,000 in the town of Youngstown, Ohio, a town that contains at present a population of 25,000 or more, and contained at the last census 15,435. The bill providing for $75,000 for a building at that town was vetoed.

The next veto that I find in this batch is of the bill providing for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, where $150,000 was proposed to be appropriated in a town where the present population has been estimated by the Senator from Iowa, who knows all about it, at 30,000, I believe.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It exceeds 32,000.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Iowa says it exceeds 32,000. The next is a bill providing for a public building in the town of Columbus, Ga., which contains a population of 10,123, and the bill provides for an expenditure of $100,000. The next is a bill for a public building in the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, containing a population in 1880 of 18,063. I will ask the Senator from Iowa what is the estimated population at present. I know it is a growing town.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. About 25,000.

Mr. HALE. The last is a case in the State of Maine, a building in the town of Bar Harbor, which is to-day perhaps the greatest resort upon the whole Atlantic coast for citizens of the United States from almost every State in the Union, a place now containing several thousand population permanently and a population in the summer varying from 15,000 to 30,000, a place with fifteen hotels and one hundred and twenty stores, running four railway trains a day, and where the convenience of the American people for months in the year is as much affected as, or more than, in any other resort in the United States. Yet a little bill for $25,000 could not pass the President's scrutiny, and he vetoed it after it had been passed by the two Houses.

Here is the significant fact, that with one exception these appropriations of the public money for public buildings apply to places that are large and growing, with a business community about them that is rapidly increasing, towns and cities that have a great future before them, as shown by the growth in the last ten years, and in all but one case lying in a Northern or Republican State.

As an offset to this, and as illustrating this pretense of economy, this claim of frugality, this claim of an honest endeavor to serve the public interests by scrutinizing appropriations and eliminating from them all useless appropriations as applied to this subject of public buildings, I have a little list that has just been hunted up in the document-room of bills for public buildings that were not vetoed by the President upon the ground of economy, upon the ground that the communities in which the buildings were situated were not extensive enough in population or in business to demand the erection of such buildings as the two branches of Congress had agreed to have.

The first one that my eye rests upon is in Greenville, S. C., where the population, as shown by the last census—and I have given the population in all the other cases as shown by the last census, so I am concealing nothing—was 912. Yet an appropriation of $100,000 for a public building at that place passed the scrutiny and received the signature of the President of the United States, who is jealously watching and guarding the public revenues, when a bill was vetoed which proposed to appropriate $75,000 for a public building at Council Bluffs, Iowa, which contains forty times the population and, I venture to say, does three hundred times the business of the little town of Greenville, S. C. Is there any Senator here who can tell why, upon any general considerations, that was done?

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator what he stated the population of Greenville, S. C., to be?

Mr. HALE. I have it down in figures as less than a thousand in 1880.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator had better re-examine the census.

Mr. HALE. What is the population? I will compare it with Council Bluffs. Suppose these figures that have been given to me are not correct.

Mr. BUTLER. One thousand! Why, the population is over 10,000.

Mr. HALE. Well, I will take that, if there has been a mistake. This list was handed to me here; it may have been a mistake in the State of South Carolina; but suppose the population is 10,000 (and I thank the Senator for correcting me), is there any reason why Greenville, S. C., should have a public building at a cost of $100,000 when Council Bluffs, with a population of 25,000, and Sioux City, with a population of 30,000, or Allentown or any of these other towns with three times the population should not have a public building? The explanation is that the Senator from South Carolina was able to railroad his bill through and obtain the President's signature, and the Senator from Iowa who sits before me and the Senator from Iowa whose seat is here and who has spoken this morning were not able to railroad their bill through.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him, I will state that I had been railroading at the bill for the last seven or eight years. It was a pretty slow piece of business, it seems to me, to railroad it through the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The Senator did not spend as much time as that with President Cleveland. I will venture to say that one interview was all that was necessary.

Mr. BUTLER. I spent very little time with the President.

Mr. HALE. One interview did the business, I will venture to say.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. HALE. Well, two.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know that my interview had any influence whatever upon him. I do not think it had.

Mr. HALE. The next is the case of Helena, Ark. The figures which have been given to me show a population in this town in 1880 of 3,652, and that is granted a public building to cost $75,000, of the same size as the building proposed for Council Bluffs, with 25,000 population, that was vetoed by the President.

Mr. ALLISON. And Sioux City.

Mr. HALE. There was an additional appropriation for Council Bluffs that was vetoed. I have the veto message here.

Mr. ALLISON. That was to buy a little land.

Mr. HALE. It was to buy a little land for securing the building.

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator once more, because I have no idea he wants to state anything but what is absolutely correct?

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not present when the gentleman first referred to Greenville, and therefore I am not informed as to whether he stated all the facts in connection with that case.

Mr. HALE. I stated no facts except that the bill which appropriated $100,000 for a public building there was signed by the President.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the Senator state that there was a Federal court held there?

Mr. HALE. I did not go into that. So there is a Federal court in Sioux City. I did not go into comparisons in either case. Indeed, I have not gone into the details. But here is Helena, Ark., with an appropriation of $75,000, with a population in 1880 of 3,652, and yet it was not found essential to the interests of economy and a frugal administration of the revenues of the Government that the public building proposed at Helena, Ark., should be stopped by a Presidential veto.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BERRY. Did the Senator state the population as shown by the census of 1880, or did he state it as it is now?

Mr. HALE. I stated it as shown by the census of 1880, as I did in all the other cases.

Mr. BERRY. And he then stated what the population is now in the other cases, did he not?

Mr. HALE. I have not stated that. What is the population of Helena?

Mr. BERRY. I suppose there are about 8,000 people there. There is a Federal court, however, in the town, and——

Mr. HALE. I am not denying that in every one of these cases there is a Federal court. There is a Federal court in Sioux City. There is a great population about there.

Mr. BERRY. Is there a Federal court at Youngstown, Ohio?

Mr. HALE. That I do not know.

Mr. BERRY. Is there a Federal court in one of the towns the Senator has named, where the bills were vetoed, except at Sioux City?

Mr. HALE. Oh, I think there is. I only sent for this list while the Senator from Iowa was speaking. But there are towns in the Southern States for which public-building bills have passed—I can not give them now, but I know it to be the fact—where there is no Federal court holden, and where money is appropriated, and where the President never thinks of vetoing the bills. I can not give the names of the towns now, but I will take one case that I do know of, because the Senators are here and can speak for it, the case of Sioux City. Yet the bill for Helena, Ark., went through without any trouble. The Senators from that State were able to get the President to append his signature to that most important bill for this most important and growing town.

Huntsville, Ala., which is a growing town, which had in 1880, 4,977 souls making up its population, which now I presume is double that, was able to gain a public building at an expense of $100,000 to the Treasury, and the bill received the President's signature, and no veto was submitted in that case.

So, Mr. President, I might go on. I do not find fault; I do not blame my friends upon the other side for seeing to it that it is so under their Administration, but the whole thing in the way of appropriations is running in the direction of appropriations for their section. The world will live longer and be wiser than now before it sees under a Democratic administration the line of economy drawn against appropriations for the Southern States, whether they be of one kind or another.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Let me finish my sentence. Every member of the Committee on Appropriations in this body has seen one thing gradually dawning and growing upon us. Items upon the appropriation bills like the item for the payment to the State of Texas in one of the appropriation bills passed by this Congress and signed by the President are more and more creeping on to appropriation bills. The representatives of that section in the other branch of Congress see to it vigilantly that their claims and their demands are answered. The North must pay the bills and it must expect to pay the bills. It is nothing startling to any one who has had a general observation of this feature of our Government as shown by its appropriations in the last four years. It is no startling thing that is shown here when we find that this Democratic Administration has needed nearly a hundred million dollars more of the people's money than its predecessor. It has not been brought so clearly to the public attention before as it has been by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], but the thing in this regard that has been is the thing that will be. There is no new thing under the sun in this regard, Mr. President; it will go on in this way, and it is natural that it should go on in this way.

I have only attempted to draw certain lessons that occurred to me while listening to the speech of the Senator from Iowa. He has laid the foundation for these comments and for others that will be made here and elsewhere. He has shown the American people, and we ought to be glad that he has done so, just what this pretense of economy amounts to. From the figures which are at his hand, and which can not be gainsaid, he has made up his statement. There it stands, and there it shows in living light what is worth every pretense of economy that can be urged by any adherent of this Administration or any misleading message or communication that may come to Congress from the head of this Administration, which is spending $100,000,000 more of money in its four years than its predecessor.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I believe this is the first time in about twenty years' service that I was ever obliged to say either to the Senate or House that I was not well enough to take part in debate or even to tell what I know about a pending measure, but that is the fact this morning. However, there are a few things that ought to be said, which perhaps I can state: others will doubtless attend to the politics that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has dragged into this discussion.

To begin with, we have had a Democratic House of Representatives all the time, except for two years, I believe, since 1875, which has taken very good care that all administrations since that date should be reasonably economical in the expenditure of public money. That period covers the administrations of Mr. Hayes, Mr. Arthur, and Mr. Cleveland. The difference, we claim, is that what we have spent since the Democratic Administration came into power has been, in the main, well expended. Since the Democratic Administration came into power we have been able to show what was done with the money appropriated. When we get money to build up a Navy we can show that we are getting a Navy.

Prior to that time Republican administrations spent hundreds of millions appropriated for the building up of a navy and produced nothing. We have had no star-route frauds and robberies under our Administration, where millions were sunk. Whatever we have spent has been spent in the public interest. Our officials have had no post-traderships and others things for sale, and have not even been accused of venality that I am aware of. The contrast is in the expenditure of the money appropriated. If we have spent $90,000,000 more in four years, the growth of the country, with its increasing population, development and business accounts for a good deal of it. This year, in addition to a great river and harbor bill which covers over two years, and the deficiencies for two years and more to be provided for, we are spending nearly $90,000,000 for pensions. All the private bills have to be added to the general pension bill. In 1885, the last year of Mr.

Arthur's administration, the whole pension-roll was only a fraction over $20,000,000. This year, as I said, it will be close to $90,000,000, and if the President of the United States had not vetoed the dependent pension bill, about which there was such a howl, it would have been $150,000,000 or perhaps $200,000,000 now. That would have disposed of a good deal of the surplus.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I am sure the Senator does not want to make an incorrect statement.

Mr. BECK. No.

Mr. ALLISON. The truth is, that for the four years which are included in that table and which were included in my statement of President Cleveland's Administration as compared with President Arthur's, the pension appropriations were only $25,000,000 more in the last four years than they were in the previous four years. That accounts for $25,000,000 of the $95,000,000.

Mr. BECK. I observe now, in running over this table, which I only got hold of a few moments ago, that the arrears of pensions ran up to $100,000,000 during one year of Arthur's administration.

Mr. ALLISON. But the next year it was $66,000,000, and the next year $20,000,000, because those three years were consolidated together by the appropriation acts; so that the three were considered together and expended as one appropriation.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he means to say that there was any year under Mr. Arthur's administration when only $20,000,000 were paid out for pensions?

Mr. BECK. I do.

Mr. TELLER. That is a mistake.

Mr. ALLISON. I have explained that to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I have here the table which shows it.

Mr. TELLER. It does not show any such thing.

Mr. BECK. It does, I beg pardon. The Senator can see it for himself.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care what the table shows; that is not the fact.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Kentucky will yield to me, I should like to make a statement.

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I speak only from recollection, but the first year included in that table the appropriation was $68,000,000, the next year $100,000,000, the next year $66,000,000, and the next year $20,000,000.

Mr. BECK. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. That is in round numbers. So taking those four years and then taking the four years beginning in 1885, the pension appropriations for the last four years were only $25,000,000 more than the pension appropriations for the four preceding years.

Mr. BECK. Very well; that is $25,000,000 to be taken from the $95,000,000. We had not heard of that item before, even assuming these facts to be correct.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not go into details upon that point.

Mr. BECK. Of course it was the arrears-of-pension act that caused the extraordinary increase during one year, and then the regular pension-roll fell off again. I wish to compare the appropriations for last year with those we are now making for the present year, and that is all I shall be able to do. The increase in the agricultural appropriation bill was explained very fairly by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. The Army appropriation bill has also been explained. The Indian appropriation bill would have been no more than it was for last year but for the Choctaw claim. These $3,000,000 will not come against us in any future bill.

We all know and the country is advised as to the number of ships we are now building for the Navy. The development we are making in that direction reasonably accounts for the increased naval appropriations. The guns and steel for guns, etc., for the Army accounts for the increase there. The Post-Office appropriation bill of last year, which was fifty-five and a half million dollars and this year is sixty and a half million dollars, would at first blush indicate that we were appropriating more money out of the Treasury for the Post-Office this year than we did last and more than we did in former years. That is not the case; the postal revenues pay it nearly all. The total deficiency, I think, is a million and a half. That is all that comes out of the Treasury, is it not?

Mr. ALLISON. It is a little more than that this year.

Mr. BECK. With all the extraordinary expenditures we had to provide for added to the appropriations for the ordinary workings of the Department, the report of the Postmaster-General shows the total deficiency to be about a million and a half dollars. All the balance of the appropriations, which amount to the vast sum of $60,800,000, really means that the business of the country has grown so rapidly, especially in the last few years, and with our increasing railroad facilities keeps on growing year by year; yet the revenues of the Post-Office Department pay it all but about a million and a half. I think for the current year the estimate of the Postmaster-General was that the Department would about pay its expenses if we did not change existing conditions.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. As I understand him, the revenues of the Post-Office Department now pay all its expenses except a deficit of about a million and a half of dollars?

Mr. BECK. About that.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator know what was the deficit in Arthur's administration?

Mr. BECK. I have not looked into that. It is difficult to state accurately, as the rates were changed at different times. Whether such changes were made in the first year of Mr. Cleveland's administration or the last year of Mr. Arthur's I do not now recollect. Some member of the Post-Office Committee can answer that. Various changes were made, as the change from 1 ounce to 2 ounces for first-class matter; that made a great deal of difference for awhile. However, the Post-Office appropriation bill, with over $60,000,000, being on the list, looks as though an immense sum of money was being expended out of the revenues of the Government, when it simply means a million and a half, and while it appears that there were $5,000,000 more expended this year than last for Post-Office purposes, there will not be in fact half as much paid out of the Treasury, I think Senators will find on examination, this year as there was the year before.

That is what I called on the Senator from Iowa to explain, because people merely looking at the figures as shown by the bills might have supposed that there was an increase of expenditure for post-office purposes, when in fact it only shows an increase of business, which the people who use the post-office pay for themselves. The real test of increased expenditure is in the regular bills which provide for the annual salaries of the employés of the Government.

The legislative appropriation bill this year appropriates only about $20,000 more than last year. That is one of the bills which shows extravagance, if any exists, perhaps more than any other, because it embraces all salaries for judges, legislators, and clerks; in short, it includes the salaries and pay of nearly everybody in the employ of the Government in its civil service. While we have added to our population many millions in the last few years, and our business is growing rapidly year by year of course, necessarily requiring more and more of expenditure, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which pays for all salaries, is this year $20,668,000, according to the table, while it was $21,300,000 in 1885, during the last year of Mr. Arthur's administration.

With the salaries and other things provided for in the legislative appropriation bill it only shows this year about $20,000 increase over last year's bill, which is a very small advance, and I think indicates economy, because, I repeat, that is the bill which tests more than anything else what is being expended for all salaries of employés. And there is where extravagance or economy is shown.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he means to say that in the legislative appropriation bill, which provides for the salaries of judicial and executive officers and salaries of every kind, the increase has been but $20,000 over last year's appropriations?

Mr. BECK. I do; and I say that it is less now, after four years, notwithstanding the growth of the country in its business, by nearly a million dollars than it was in the last year of the administration of President Arthur. Among the items that do not belong to annual appropriation bills are large amounts running up to, say, $25,000,000, to be spent for guns that we are experimenting with, and for steel that we are buying with which to try to build up an efficient Army and Navy. These extraordinary expenditures have been made because we have been endeavoring for the last three or four years to do something to put ourselves in a condition to defend ourselves, if nothing else. That makes up more than the difference which may appear between appropriations now and during Mr. Arthur's administration. The Army appropriation bill this year and the naval appropriation bill are larger than they were last year, I think. I have not had time to go over the table presented by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. I know we have been spending a good deal of money for these things.

But all charges of extravagance are answered when it is shown that the legislative appropriation bill shows no increase, but a diminution of three-quarters of a million from what it was four years ago and none or hardly any over last year; having accounted for $25,000,000 at least in the increase for pensions, having endeavored to explain the post-office matter, then comes the river and harbor bill, which of course we all understand is nearly twenty-two millions and a half this year, and there was nothing appropriated for rivers and harbors last year. There is nearly $18,000,000 of deficiency this year, when there would have been less than ten millions perhaps if the deficiencies of last year had been properly charged. That is about the proportion, I think, and many of these deficiencies, I may observe, have been caused by our own legislation. We have reduced the hours of the letter-carriers. We have given additional leave of absence with pay to other employés, and in many ways created deficiencies which the Departments could not control.

Mr. ALLISON. There were certainly $5,000,000 of deficiencies last year.

Mr. BECK. More than that I think. As to the increase of appropriations for this year over last, take off the river and harbor bill and account for extraordinary appropriations for the Army and Navy, the $3,000,000 for the Choctaw claims, and the increase is not large. Everything can be ascertained substantially now, with the exception of the sundry civil appropriation bill, which is yet in conference, and the exact amount of that depends upon what we agree on. We have in the sundry civil appropriation bill a million dollars for the new Library building, for example. That is not an expenditure of the Administration. That building and the expenditures for it will go on for years. We are proposing to buy a block near the Post-Office building that may cost us a million dollars more, for permanent public uses. We are seeking to add to the Government Printing Office by buying half a block there. That may cost us a good deal of money. These are things that the needs of the Government require. We have more public buildings going on now than we had four years ago, but all this talk about the public buildings, it seems to me, amounts to very little.

I can name four cities—the city of New York, the city of Pittsburgh, the city of Cincinnati, and the city of St. Louis—which have four public buildings, and if the amount appropriated for them is aggregated those four public buildings will cost this Government three times more than all the appropriations which are being made this year for all the public buildings over the country. Nearly $10,000,000 was spent in New York alone for a post-office; at Pittsburgh, God knows how much; $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 at Cincinnati; $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 at St. Louis, perhaps. The small public buildings that are going on all over the country are saving us rent where we have United States court or for internal-revenue offices and post-office or matters connected with our customs. The purchase of a piece of property by the Government at $75,000, or $100,000, or $150,000, when money is worth to us only 3 or 4 per cent., is certainly an economical investment, and is in no proper sense either extravagant or wasteful.

The President may have vetoed some of these measures wrongfully. He may have had reasons for doing so in some cases about which I do not know, because I have not examined his veto messages. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds can explain all that, and if necessary no doubt will, but I have given the general condition. The increases this year over last year are accounted for almost entirely, perhaps entirely, by the river and harbor bill, by the deficiencies for two years being all thrown into this, as there was no deficiency bill passed for last year and no river and harbor bill, and by the appropriations for the guns and armaments that we are endeavoring to obtain for the use of the Army and the Navy. There has been no increase in the legislative appropriation bill, no increase in the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and no increase in the Indian appropriation bill. There has been a falling off in the Military Academy appropriation bill. There has been an increase of course in the pension appropriations, as we all understand.

The sundry civil appropriation bill is not yet out of conference. It will perhaps come out appropriating $25,000,000 or $26,000,000. I do not know how it compares with those under Mr. Arthur's administration, but it is somewhere along in the same general line. I see $22,000,000 in 1882, $25,000,000 in 1883, twenty-three and a half million dollars in 1884, twenty-two and a quarter million dollars in 1885, and so on in the table furnished by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], substantially what we have it now. There has been a little swell perhaps, growing out of the necessities of the Government. We have more light-houses than we ever had. We are lighting up more rivers than we ever did. Our Life-Saving Service is improving and extending. We have added very much to the cost of our Geological Survey in the last few years, only I think we are going a little too fast upon that line; and there is too little accountability when you come to understand it; and so with many other things.

Therefore the alarm about the using up of the revenues of the Government may as well be dismissed. It is said there is a difference of only about $20,000,000 between the estimated revenues and what we are expending. You can take half the river and harbor bill off, and you can take off all or at least half the deficiency appropriations. Twelve million dollars and $8,000,000 make $20,000,000. That is, $40,000,000 that you can very well count as surplus, and as the Senator from Iowa very well knows, we can take the $50,000,000 that we call a sinking fund and count it as a surplus beyond the needs of the Government, as we have no bonds we can buy with it except at a high premium.

That constitutes a surplus of $90,000,000, to say nothing of all that we have lying idle in the Treasury now. There is no need ot any alarm about any reduction of taxation that is proposed, or that there is not being idle surplus money enough for all purposes. Of course our permanent appropriations, which are stated in this exhibit at, say, $115,000,000, are decreasing, and must decrease rapidly. We have bought a large number of bonds, some $60,000,000 perhaps. Every bond we buy diminishes the amount required for the permanent appropriations, which embrace the interest on the public debt, the sinking fund, and all that class of things.

While my friend, the Senator from Maine, was speaking I turned to the monthly statement. We have to-day only $220,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds that are payable in 1891 outstanding. We have $713,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds that do not mature until 1907. The total interest upon the whole bonded debt is $9,440,000 on the four-and-a-halfs and $28,520,000 on the $713,000,000 of fours, making a total interest that from this time on we shall have to pay of $38,460,000, and it will diminish day by day. It was $52,000,000 two or three years ago, and nearly $150,000,000 twenty years ago. That is dropping off as fast as we buy bonds, and the reduction of interest increases the surplus as fast as we become the owners of the bonds.

The estimates of appropriation, known as permanent, for the payment of interest and other things, being based upon the total amount outstanding at the time estimated for, gives no credit for the amount we have bought in the mean time. Of course it adds that much to our surplus. So beyond all doubt we have the sinking fund, which everybody knows can only be applied to the purchase of bonds, with about $120,000,000 lying idle in the Treasury now, in addition to the $100,000,000 that is supposed to be guarding greenbacks. That money alone will buy every bond we have that can be paid at par before 1907. The $50,000,000 so called a sinking fund is as much a surplus as any other money. I do not propose to discuss that question now. The Senator from Ohio thinks I am cranky about that. We will attend to that after awhile and see whether I am or not, when we come to discuss it, as we shall, I hope, when the tariff bill is brought before the Senate, if it ever gets there.

As I said, I am not physically able to go into any discussion beyond fairly stating what we have done. All I desire to add is, that I have been upon the Committee on Appropriations for nearly twelve years. I have served with the Senator from Iowa for a long time. The charges that have been made, to which he referred, from any quarter, I do not care whether made by the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else, that the Senate has been extravagant in its appropriations, are all wrong.

We have kept the appropriations down below the estimates. We have never had a political division in regard to any action taken in the committee. Instead of the Senate being blamed for any extravagance in making appropriations, I think every Department of the Government ought to thank the Senator from Iowa for the careful way in which he has considered all their claims and the absolute justice he has endeavored to do them in making the appropriations necessary to carry them on. Anything that implies censure on him or his committee is all wrong, no matter from what source it comes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have no desire to enter into a discussion about the expenditures of the Government. I believe, however, that it is well that occasionally the attention of the country should be called to the expenditures, because a watchful vigilance on the part of the people will have a tendency to restrain the extravagance of those who represent them in the two Houses of Congress. It is well, therefore, that the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Kentucky, members of the Committee on Appropriations, have called the attention of the Senate and the country to the expenditures which are made to carry on the Government.

I have no criticism to make of that committee. I have no doubt, as has been remarked by the Senator from Kentucky, that the committee is vigilant and careful in its investigations into the necessary expenditures to carry on the Government; but I do object that there should be an attempt made by the Senator from Iowa, and especially by the Senator from Maine, to throw upon the present Administration the responsibility for the extravagances which have been indulged in in the expenditure of public money. Everybody knows that the President of the United States has no control over the Treasury of the United States; that the appropriations are made by laws enacted by Congress, not by the executive department. If there has been any extravagance it is chargeable to the two Houses of Congress, and not to the President and the executive department of the Government.

I have no doubt that there have been unnecessary appropriations under the authority of law, which the Committee on Appropriations could not fail to provide for, because the laws of the land required them to be made; but it is unjust, it is unfair to the executive department of the Government to attempt to say that under the administration of President Cleveland the expenditures of the Government have been increased, with an evident intent, if possible, to make the impression upon the country that the administration of President Cleveland has been unnecessarily extravagant in the use of public money, when every Senator here knows that there is not a dollar which the President can handle without the appropriation having been made by Congress.

I think, with all due deference to Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, that there has been a disposition on the part of Republican Senators to increase the expenditures. It was evident from the very inception of the present session of Congress that one of the purposes which dominated the majority of the Senate was to reduce the surplus in the Treasury by unnecessary appropriations of money. Everybody saw that it was one of the tactics of the present session on the part of the Republican Senate to reduce that surplus, to which attention had been called by the President in his annual message, by extravagant expenditures of the public money. There is no disguising that fact. Need I cite the Blair bill, which proposed at one fell swoop to take $77,000,000 from the public Treasury, not all in the present year, but a part in the present year? The inspiration in part for that movement was to reduce the surplus, so as to prevent, if possible, a reduction of taxation upon the people which created that surplus.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will yield for a question; but I am not going to make any set speech, and I prefer to proceed in my own way.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to remind the Senator, in regard to the educational bill of which he speaks, that it is older than the surplus; that the necessity for it is older than the surplus, and that it was not a strict party measure in its support, though I will admit in its influence and tendency, if it shall have an elevating and civilizing effect, it may perhaps make it liable to the charge of its being a Republican measure. But, sir, it is older than the surplus. It was introduced in the year 1881; it has been pending ever since, and I assure the Senator from Delaware that it will remain pending, surplus or no surplus, until it is a law, or until the necessity which calls for its passage and the evil which it is designed to remedy have both been removed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My friend from New Hampshire will, I hope, not intrude upon my courtesy.

Mr. BLAIR. I intruded upon the Senator's courtesy only by telling the truth. I hope his courtesy will not run counter to matters of fact again.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am not disposed to enter into a controversy in reference to the truth of the statements of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I was simply expressing myself very briefly in regard to a subject which was brought to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Iowa and to which a political turn had been sought to be given, with the view, I suppose, of prejudicing the administration of President Cleveland in the eyes of the country. I simply rose to protest against any such attempt on the part of Senators on the Republican side of the Chamber to charge the executive administration of this Government with any extravagance that they may have indulged in, for they know and everybody else knows that the President can not touch a single dollar in the public Treasury without the appropriation having been made by Congress. I then said that as soon as the attention of the country was called by the annual message of the President to the surplus that was threatening the business of the country, which had accumulated in the Treasury, the first purpose manifested on the part of the Republican side of the Chamber was by an extravagant use of the public money to deplete that surplus in the Treasury and to take away a strong argument against the reduction of the taxes upon the people of the country.

We know of other measures. Not only was there the Blair bill to which I have referred, but against the protest of an executive officer of this Government, against the protest of the Postmaster-General declaring that he did not need it, $800,000, I believe, was proposed as a subsidy to hitch on the appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department, and against his urgent protest you brought forward that measure and thrust it down his throat so far as the action of the Senate was concerned.

Can you charge an Administration with extravagance when it has resisted some of the extravagance which you have proposed by your legislation in the Senate? It is evidently unfair on the part of the Senator from Maine, and I can not exonerate the Senator from Iowa fully, to attempt to hold up the administration of President Cleveland as an extravagant administration, because by your efforts the expenditures of the Government have been increased.

As the country grows, as the business of the country enlarges, there must necessarily be an enlargement of public expenditures; and I do not say that Congress acts unwisely in meeting the growing demand upon the public Treasury; but I do say that after you have come here and enacted laws which require the appropriation of money it is unfair to undertake to hold the administration of President Cleveland up as an extravagant administration when he has not the power to touch a single dollar in the public Treasury except under the authority of law.

Without making any criticism upon the Committee on Appropriations, or without intending to dissent from the necessity for these appropriations, because the laws require them, I did think it unfair, when there was being an exposé made of the expenditures of the Government, to fasten a charge directly or impliedly upon the Administration, charging it with extravagance when it is known to every Senator that that Administration is not responsible for the expenditure of a single dollar from the public Treasury except as it obeys the laws which Congress enacts.

Mr. VEST. I am informed—I was not in the Senate at the time—that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] drew a comparison between appropriations for public buildings in the Northern and Southern States, and that he asked the question, Who pays for these public buildings? why is this money so unequally distributed? etc. As I happen to be a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and have paid some attention to the distribution of these public expenditures, I wish to call the attention of the country and of the Senate to Senate Report No. 89, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, which is a statement of all the expenditures for public buildings by the Government from March 4, 1789, to March 4, 1885, and which is the last official summary upon this subject.

By the census of 1880 the State of Maine had 648,936 people. The expenditures for public buildings according to this report up to 1885 were $2,231,114.

Mr. REAGAN. In that State?

Mr. VEST. In the State of Maine alone $2,231,114 was expended for public buildings up to 1885. In the State of Arkansas, with a population by the census of 1880 of 802,525, or one hundred and sixty-odd thousand more than in the State of Maine, there was expended for public buildings during the same period $309,317, or an excess in the State of Maine alone over Arkansas, with a superior population in Arkansas, of nearly $2,000,000.

In the State of Alabama, which had by the same census 1,262,505 people (nearly if not fully twice as many as the State of Maine), there was expended during the same time $619,807 against $2,231,114 in the State of Maine, although the State of Alabama had twice the population. In the State of Georgia, with a population of 1,542,180 (within a few hundred thousand of three times as many as the State of Maine), there was expended in the same period $500,849.

If any Senator from the State of Maine, in the face of that exhibit, can talk about the unequal distribution of public money for public buildings, I commend his public audacity.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and it does not devolve upon me to undertake to instruct the Senate or the country upon the questions that are pending here and under discussion now. I have not the slightest objection, and I do not mean to offer any opposition or criticism to the methods the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] may see fit to employ in disporting himself before this Chamber after a fashion that comports with his own good taste. I am not discussing any item in the appropriation bill, but I mean to call the attention of the Senate to a matter clearly outside of the pending bill, which the Senator from Maine has seen fit to lug into the debate after a fashion that involves a question of common decency.

The Senator from Maine saw fit to refer to a message which the President of the United States sent here but recently upon the matter of the rejection of a treaty regulating open matters of dispute between this and a friendly power; and he undertook to make it germane to the discussion and to the issue which he was pretending to handle by telling us that it had never been given to human power to calculate the losses that were imposed upon us by methods such as were suggested in that document. With that treaty, as with this appropriation bill, I have no special concern, for I am not charged by committee service with handling either the one or the other, and I do not care to say aught about either the treaty or the message except this, which I do in all kindness, that it does occur to me that there is nobody torn up or disturbed about the action of the other side of the Chamber in rejecting the treaty nor about the message which came here as a consequence of its rejection—at least nobody who sits around me. If anybody is disturbed or sweating blood over that transaction, it occurs to me that he must sit on the other side of the Chamber.

The President said nothing in his message except that he had tried, after a friendly fashion, to accommodate existing differences with a friendly power, and that the Republican majority of the Senate had refused to allow him to do it; and he simply added what as an honest man he ought to have added, that he trusted the gentlemen who had reversed his action and remitted him to methods that were hostile would be fair enough, and manly enough, and honest enough to give him the legislation that was needed to enable him to do what I fear they will not do, but come in and play the rôle of bully or bravado, to execute the orders that the Senate of this country saw fit to impose, and to execute the laws which he had sworn to execute and which he has done after a fashion to the satisfaction of the American people.

But that is not what I want to call the attention of the Senate to. The Senator from Maine in pretending to discuss an item in an appropriation bill has seen fit to drag before this body what he says is testimony taken by a committee of this Chamber, raised on his own resolution, and of which he is chairman, and of which I chance to be a member.

By accident, it may be, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Rules of this body, as is its worthy Presiding Officer. I have been a member of the Committee on Rules ever since I have been a Senator, but I have never found the rule, and I defy the man who lives to point me to a rule that warranted the Senator from Maine in dragging into this Chamber in a political harangue, for the accomplishment of a partisan purpose, testimony taken before a committee of this body which has never been validated by a report made upon it, and which he himself has never permitted to see the light of day.

Mr. HALE. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will go further.

Mr. HALE. Let me state that it is printed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know it is printed. I will go further, and then the Senator will not want to interrupt me before I am done.

Mr. HALE. It is all printed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know it is.

Mr. HALE. Every particle of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know it is, and delivered according to the Senator's order, and not to me.

Mr. HALE. Every Senator has had an opportunity to see it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well, Mr. President, if the gentleman will contain his soul in peace——

Mr. HALE. The Senator is making a mare's nest of nothing.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, but I shall make that Senator feel that he owes an apology to this Chamber for what he has done, not only for what he has done to-day in dragging that testimony here when under the rules and under the practice and under the precedents that govern in this and in every other decent legislative body he stood precluded; but that is not the gravamen of the charge. I shall go further and make it worse, and make the Senator from Maine my witness.

Mr. HALE. Well, go on.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I shall, and I am not indebted to your permission for it either.

I mean to say that the Senator from Maine offered a resolution in this Chamber, and under its provisions he raised a committee, a mud-slinging committee, so advertised to the world and branded on every lineament of its ill-visaged face. He started out to hold this Administration responsible for inconsistency in the matter of the execution of the greatest and grandest political abortion, in my judgment, that ever afflicted or cursed mankind in the shape of a civil-service law. He lugged that committee to Baltimore, to Philadelphia, and to New York, and then allowed days to stretch into weeks, and then permitted weeks to lapse into months before he ever called it together again; and he has not called it now, and does not dare to do it.

Disgusted with his failure of find, skulking away from his self-imposed duties, which were intended to answer and to accomplish political purposes, never daring to make a report, never calling that committee together in order to consider the testimony which had been adduced, outside of rule, disregarding precedent, flaunting defiance into the very face of the ordinary promptings of propriety, he undertakes to lug in the testimony which you have never seen, nor any man in this Chamber, and brings it in, as I assert upon my responsibility both as a Senator and as a man, for the sole and single purpose of perverting and distorting it.

Nor is that the worst. More than that, he undertook (and he dare not in this presence deny it) to accomplish the partisan purpose with which he offered the resolution and raised the committee which he has since abandoned and deserted in the face of his discomfiture, by taking testimony within the very walls of this Capitol and in the wing of this Senate Chamber without notice given to a majority or a quorum of his committee, and he took the testimony without the administration of an oath, and accepted the unsworn statements of a tramp, when the committee was never advised of his appearance, and incorporated that in the record, of which this Chamber is to-day profoundly ignorant.

I am perfectly willing for this Administration to be held responsible if it has been extravagant in the expenditure of public money. I am perfectly willing that the fullest measure of responsibility that attaches to every man, from the occupant of the White House down to the humblest member of the party he leads, shall be dealt out and applied; but I do protest that in the discussion of a clear and a naked appropriation bill it is not fair, it is not just, it does not, in my judgment, comport with the dignity of this Chamber to employ methods and use arguments after such a fashion, with such antecedents, and in face of such a record, as the Senator from Maine has seen fit to employ.

I protest that it was but common fairness, if the Senator from Maine meant to use one atom of testimony that had ever been taken by a committee over which he presided, that he should have first made a report to the Chamber which gave him his power, and afforded to a muzzled minority at least the opportunity and chance to answer him and to vindicate the truth.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in treating the Senate to a discussion of public affairs in which every Senator and the country is interested, I shall not take the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] as my model. There is no issue between him and me personally. There will be none between him and me personally. Neither do I choose in anything that I may say to the Senate to employ the words "decent," "bravado," "tramp," and "skulking." I do not accuse the Senator from Kentucky, because these things are not in the controversy here in which the Senate is engaged.

In speaking of one of the pretenses and shams which had been exposed on this floor by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], I referred, as was natural, and as other Senators many a time have referred, by analogy to other pretenses and shams which had been exposed; the attitude of the Administration upon the fisheries, for instance, and the attitude of the Administration upon civil-service reform; and if my reference to the attitude of the Administration upon civil-service reform had not been apposite, had not had force and had not drawn blood, the Senator from Kentucky would not have been so sensitive and he would not have sought to project offensive remarks and personal allusions into this discussion.

The world knows that the Administration is discredited in its pretenses of civil-service reform. Every particle of testimony that has been taken by the committee of which I am chairman, and of which the Senator from Kentucky is a member, was taken in open daylight before the world; was commented upon by the newspapers. Every one of the things I referred to, only briefly, as an illustration of my proposition that one by one the pretenses of the Administration were being exploded, has been before the public of the United States and has been commented upon.

Mr. CHACE. The newspaper reporters were present at the hearings.

Mr. HALE. The newspaper reporters were invited to be present at every one of the meetings of the committee, whether the Senator from Kentucky has been there or has been otherwise engaged. The testimony was given to the public.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Senator if I ever failed to meet the committee when I had notice of a meeting?

Mr. HALE. I will come to that very soon. Every particle of the testimony was taken openly and in public, and commented upon so that upon the testimony as produced the New York Post, at present a clamorous and vociferous and able organ of the Administration, declared that in America no man was left to place credit upon the civil-service reform statements and assumptions of the President and his administration.

All that is ancient history, Mr. President; all that has been demonstrated; and I am glad that the committee over which I have had the honor to preside has helped to demonstrate it, and has been as open and as above-board in everything it has done as it has been.

The work of that committee has not been finished by any means. There have been hearings held from time to time as it was deemed advisable to hold them. Has the Senator from Kentucky ever asked the committee to have a hearing upon his side of the subject that would in any way illustrate his propositions? Has the Senator from Kentucky ever asked that there be a hearing of any member of the Administration who wanted to meet and countervail the testimony that is overwhelmingly against the Administration? Why has he not brought before the committee the Secretary of the Treasury, who I was notified desired to be heard, and I told the Senator from Kentucky that if he had any explanation to make about the disclosures that were brought forth in the New York testimony he should have the opportunity at any time?

More than two months have gone by, and he has never knocked at the door of the committee to be heard. Neither has the collector in New York, nor the surveyor in New York, nor has any man in Baltimore, or Philadelphia, or wherever the committee has done its work ever dared to appear and request a hearing before the committee, because the testimony was overwhelming——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator from Maine mean to tell this Chamber that none of the officials of New York, Baltimore, or Philadelphia did appear and testify before the committee?

Mr. HALE. Precious few of them ever did appear, and the rest of them who were responsible never ventured to appear before the committee, but they stand under the crushing weight of the testimony that the public has already taken notice of.

I stand here in the Senate as representing its favor in having been assigned as chairman of the committee, and I wish to call attention to what the Senator has chosen in a most remarkable outburst here to intimate, that there has been something like unfair play in the hearings of the committee.

Mr. President, I have been longer a member of the Senate than the Senator from Kentucky. My brother Senators know something about my methods in committees of this body; and I might leave all of this to them and to their undistempered judgments upon this subject-matter. Is there any Senator here who believes that I have secretly and covertly taken testimony when the other side has not been notified?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HALE. I will state the cold facts here, and then the Senator may reply if he chooses.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I shall do so.

Mr. HALE. Early in the investigation I was informed that there was testimony with reference to the conduct of officers in the State of Indiana, and especially in the Indianapolis post-office, which was desired to be given. Suddenly there appeared here one day a gentleman, who is not a tramp, who is well known in Indiana, who is known to the Senators from Indiana, and if they were here they would testify as to his high character and standing. He was going to leave the city and desired to give testimony or present documents before the committee.

I had no time to send out a written notification by the clerk of the committee. I did more than that. I went to the other side and sought to find members of the committee. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] was not in his place—which was no fault of his; the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] was not in his place; but the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT] was in his place, and I am glad to see that he is here now, and I shall ask him to make a statement of this matter before it is ended. I told him the situation and asked him to try to hunt up, between that time and the time the gentleman would appear before the committee, the other members of the minority of the committee. I was not able to find more than two or three of the members on this side. At the appointed time the gentleman appeared. The Senator from New Jersey was there, representing his party; I was there and another member of the committee, and we sat down and received the statements and the papers which were presented by the gentleman from Indiana. The other side was represented, as we were. I do not remember that there was any cross-examination or any examination of any account whatever. The gentleman presented his papers; he told his story, and went off, as he declared, about his business.

Nay, more than that, Mr. President—and I might make this the subject of a personal complaint against the Senator from Kentucky, and might compare his method with mine, but I do not do that—more than that, the Senator from Kentucky came to me soon afterward with some appearance of excitement and asked me how it had been done, and I said, "I refer you to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT], who will tell you all about it." He saw the Senator from New Jersey, and I never from that day to this until his outburst here supposed that the Senator from Kentucky harbored a single thought that anything had been done in a covert way. He and I have sat together about the table taking testimony in this committee since then, and no allusion has been made to that thing in the past.

If there is anything that should be closed and considered closed among honorable men, it is that. There was no fault of mine in the matter whatever. The whole thing was known to the Senator from New Jersey, who was the only representative of his party there, and the whole thing ended. Over and again, under like conditions, I would do the same thing; and if the Senator from Kentucky in an emergency like that, and in a committee like that, had done as I did, and it was explained to me as it was explained to him, I do not think I would consider that it ought to be made an instance of a charge of unfair dealing on the Senate floor. We do not do things in that way, the rest of us, in the Senate of the United States. I have never before known such a little thing, a matter of no account, to be made the basis of a charge such as the Senator from Kentucky has made here, and I trust, whether his days or mine be long or short in the Senate of the United States, that it will never occur again.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that it might have been well enough while the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was on the floor and undertaking to tell what happened about that unprecedented, unusual, singular, unpatented testimony that he took on that occasion, involving the conduct of officials of the Indian Office and of the Post-Office, for him, as he was not limited in time, to have gone on and told all of it.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator mean?

Mr. BLACKBURN. He did not see fit to do it, but I will.

Mr. HALE. The testimony is all printed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state now what the Senator did not—the balance of the truth. I went to the seat of the Senator from Maine on the very morning after this testimony, if testimony it be, was taken. I should insult the intelligence of a single Senator who sits upon this floor if I were to call it testimony or anything else but balderdash. I went to him and he told me that about the time the Senate was adjourning on the day before he found that he wanted to take this man's proof, and he wanted to take it the next morning at an hour that antedated the meeting of the Senate or any of its committees. No wonder he did not find the Senator from Virginia, nor is it to be wondered that he did not find me, but it is to be wondered that he found the Senator from New Jersey or anybody else upon such notice.

That is not all. He took this proof the next morning without a quorum of that committee present. I undertake to say that the Senator never administered an oath, and that none of the statutes that run against perjury apply to the case of the witness that he parades in the printed testimony. And more; when I went to his seat, having heard of this, and asked him what had induced him to disregard the rules of this body and the practice that had ever prevailed when he and I had served in the House, before either of us was a Senator, I told him that it was my purpose to rise to a question of personal privilege on this floor and call the attention of the Senate to what had been done and demand the passage of a resolution that should protect the minority from such treatment in the future, and he begged me not to do it, and told me that it would not happen again.

He says now that I went to the Senator from New Jersey, and saw him and satisfied myself. I beg the Senator from Maine to let me correct his statement. I never went to the Senator from New Jersey, and I had no conference with him about it. I did not need to confer with anybody. I knew that a fundamental rule of this body had been violated. I knew that every precedent had been outraged. I knew that fair dealing, which should be observed toward the minority, either in the matter of giving them a hearing or of putting the party testifying under the responsibilities of an oath, had been violated. That was all of it.

But that, Mr. President, is not the gravamen of my charge. I do not care anything about that. When the Senator from Maine begged me not to raise this question of privilege, and not to call the attention of the Senate to what he had done, I did not tell him that it was all settled, as he would have the Senate infer. On the contrary, I told him that I would hold it in abeyance as a right of my own for future use if I saw proper to make it. That was the parting that occurred between us.

But that is not the gravamen of my charge. I insist that this Senate shall know that a committee of its own creation, over which the Senator from Maine presides, raised months and months ago, has taken testimony in some of the largest cities in this country, and weeks have stretched into months since that committee had a session. As a member of it I have no reason this day to believe that it ever is to meet again, and in the light of the testimony which the Senator has without warrant undertaken to deal with, I am satisfied, unless he has gone stark mad, that it will never meet again. He has lugged that testimony into this Chamber when he would not dare to accompany it with a report, when not a member of the Chamber, unless it be one of the members of the committee, has ever had an opportunity to read it, or to see it, or to hear it. That is what I complain of.

And I complain further, and here is where the substance of my grievance lies, that the Senator from Maine has not stated the testimony fairly; he has perverted it. If I am to be permitted in self-defense to follow a bad example which he has set, I will undertake to say that the official RECORD of this Chamber, as published to-morrow morning, will not show one single, solitary, material statement that he has made as embodied in that testimony which is true in fact or has a semblance of foundation.

I do not blame the Senator for getting sick. If he is determined to wade clear through the record made by this committee, let him do so. The testimony taken in the metropolis of this country he never heard, for he never was inside the committee-room and never crossed its threshold from the day we got there until the day we left.

Mr. HALE. It was all reported.

Mr. BLACKBURN. He was not able to cross it, he never heard a word of it. The whole case in New York turned on the testimony of three men in reference to that sugar trust, and the chairman of the committee knows it. One of the witnesses was a deaf doctor, I believe a dentist. Whether the Lord had deprived him of his power of hearing in order to enable us to force him to tell the truth I do not know, but he could not listen to the perjury of the other two witnesses, upon whom the case turned—those two brothers. They had been dismissed the service. In the light of that testimony, if the Senator from Maine should ever agree to present it to this Chamber, I will undertake as a Senator to ask the verdict and the judgment of every honest man on this floor to answer but one question, and that is whether he is satisfied that both of those sugar thieves, those brothers on whom the case turned, ought not to have been borne into the penitentiary instead of being put into high and responsible office by a Republican administration of this country. The case broke down, Mr. President. The witnesses crossed each other's tracks. There stood these two brothers swearing to a transfer of real estate, which involved the whole question, and the fellow that they swore bought it from them, unable to hear what they were telling, swore point blank that they lied from beginning to end. [Laughter.]

That is the case in New York. You may go to Baltimore or to Philadelphia. I will not undertake to speak of the Indiana case, because I do not know what that irresponsible fellow did say down here who was never required even to take an oath to tell the truth; but the Senator from Maine has not stated the testimony nor a synopsis nor even a conclusion that any impartial judicial mind would ever reach that would read over the testimony.

Now, Mr. President, I have done with this. I have simply called the attention of this Chamber to the fact that one of its committees, through its authorized chairman, has pursued the very questionable course and policy of lugging into debate on this floor testimony taken under the authority of this Chamber, that has never been submitted to its consideration. And I only ask in conclusion (and that is all I ever meant to ask) that the chairman of the committee will not undertake to mislead either the American Senate or the American people by what I have no hesitation in declaring is a perversion and a torturing of testimony, unpublished, taken by the committee; but, if he wants to rely on it for any purpose, bring it here to this Chamber; and I challenge and defy him to do it.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to say one word, Mr. President, which I wanted to say before I last sat down; that is, that every word of this testimony will be presented to the Senate. The work of the committee has been going on in a public way. From time to time I have presented resolutions in the open Senate, asking for information from the Departments touching violations of the civil-service law and the spirit of civil-service reform in the different Departments. From time to time the replies to those resolutions have come in. Some of them have been unaccountably delayed in the Departments. Some of them have been so much delayed that I have been myself obliged to resort to a second call, drawing the attention of the heads of the Departments to the fact that an inquiry was already pending and unanswered.

As these reports have come in they have been taken and collected and collated by the clerk of the committee, a gentleman of complete integrity and competency on this subject; and in due time, whether more testimony is taken or not, whether anybody comes in to be heard on the other side or not, a report will be prepared, the committee will be notified of it; it will be scrutinized, objected to, it may be, by the Senator from Kentucky and some or all of his associates on the other side, and objected to, likely, by members on this side. It will be prepared by the whole committee, it will be presented to this Senate, Mr. President, and the Senator from Kentucky, who seems to be, from what he has said, in profound ignorance of this subject at one time, and at another time knowing more about it than anybody else, will have the full opportunity (which he has had) to examine and to read the testimony, and the Senate will have, and the whole country will have, an opportunity to read it.

The work is not done by any means. The investigation has not failed. I have no great pride, Mr. President, in anything that I am connected with, nor have I any belief that I can do a great deal of good for the public service. I am not so made up that I believe it is essential that the things I have done should be brought before the Senate in any swelling or pompous manner. I am simply trying to do my duty. This report will be presented here in due time, and then the Senate and the public will do whatever is right about it.

I wish to say one word about what the Senator has brought up in reference to the hearing which has been spoken of. It has not dwelt upon my mind as a matter of consequence. I am not sensitive about it. I have made the explanation here. I never begged him not to present his personal grievance, as he put it, to the Senate, or the question of privilege. When he came to me I asked him not to do it until he had seen the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT], who knew all about it. I do not know that he ever said a word to the Senator from New Jersey. He says that he did not. My recollection is that immediately afterward I saw him in conversation with the Senator from New Jersey, but I do not on that set my word against the Senator's. I may be mistaken. If he did not go to the Senator from New Jersey he certainly had the opportunity to do so. There I leave it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will do the Senator from Maine the justice to say that the Senator from New Jersey told me that he was present at this meeting, but took no part in the action of the committee, and that no quorum was there and no witness was sworn.

Mr. HALE. There was no formal taking of testimony. There was no testimony taken of any great account. The gentleman from Indiana produced some papers and documents and they were put in. The whole thing was informal. If the Senator from New Jersey believes that there was anything unfair in that meeting I would like him to state it. He was there. I see the Senator from New Jersey in his seat.

Mr. BLODGETT. What was the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. My request was that if the Senator from New Jersey believes there was anything unfair in that meeting he should state it to the Senate.

Mr. BLODGETT. I can not add anything to what has been said by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky. There is perhaps a misunderstanding between those Senators. There was no testimony taken at that first meeting. A gentleman from Indiana came there and left some papers as a basis of future investigation. That I understood. He was not sworn, it is true. That was about all that occurred.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLODGETT. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does not the Senator know that that statement, unsworn as it was, and made without a quorum of the committee present, is incorporated into the printed report of the testimony of the committee?

Mr. BLODGETT. I do not know it. I have not read the report of the testimony.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose that there is one time in half a dozen that a quorum of a committee appears here when testimony is being taken. The work is frequently done by one member of a committee. Generally there is some conference between the members of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, there are one or two matters of public importance that I think ought to be brought to the attention of the Senate in connection with the appropriation bills, not of a partisan character at all, but of a public nature. I think it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to them.

Any man observant of public affairs must have noted the significance of the recent change in the course of trade in this country, which may have a great and serious effect on our appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will say to the Senator that we can not hear a word over here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio will pause a moment until order is restored. Senators will please resume their seats, and if they have occasion for conversation will retire to the adjoining rooms. The Chair also requests spectators in the gallery to observe order, to keep their seats, and refrain from conversation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I repeat, Mr. President, that the indications of a change in the balance of trade in this country are such that it may very speedily have a very important bearing upon the appropriation bills. I wish to state one or two facts in regard to the condition of our trade and in regard to the condition of the Treasury, which it seems to me ought to be heeded and acted upon by the Committee on Appropriations.

Disguise it as we will, within the last two years there has been a growing current of trade against the United States. That is a fact of important bearing in indicating the probable condition of affairs in the future. I have before me the last statement of the Treasury Department—indeed, the last two statements of that Department—showing that for the year ending June 30, 1888, the exports of merchandise from this country were $695,954,639. There were for the same period, of gold and silver exports, $46,414,183, making the total exports of this country $742,368,822. There were of imports during the same year, merchandise, $723,879,813; there were of gold and silver imports during the same year, $59,337,986, making an aggregate of $783,217,799; showing an excess of imports for this year of $40,848,977.

This condition has been increasing monthly. The imports for the month of July, 1888, were $61,329,461; the exports for the same month were $45,267,938, showing a balance of trade against us of $16,061,523.

Now, Mr. President, to show the significance of these figures, and of the fact I have stated, because it is a fact of striking importance, I wish to call your attention to the balances of trade in different years during different periods of time, to show the effect they had and how they were an indication of the condition of domestic affairs in this country.

I find that for several years before 1870 the balance of trade was against us. From 1870 onward the tables I have here give the figures up to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, but not that ending June 30, 1888. I will not read the figures in detail, but will insert the table in my remarks, and will make some comments on such of the figures as I shall quote.

The balance of trade had been running against us for a period of years when the panic of 1873 at once suspended importations into this country, largely reduced our revenues, checked the domestic trade of the country, and brought upon us, as we all know, a severe financial panic and extended bankruptcy, a condition of affairs that need not be described in so intelligent a body as the Senate of the United States.

Succeeding that, however, the balance of trade again ran in our favor, as will be seen in 1874, when it was some fifty-seven millions; in 1875 the balance in our favor was fifty-one millions, and so on, as the table shows, until at the time of greatest prosperity it rose to the enormous sum of two hundred and sixty-nine millions in our favor in 1879. It continued in our favor, though with some fluctuation, during 1881–'82, when there was more or less stringency in this country, at one time (1882) falling to thirty-two millions and rising again to one hundred and four millions in 1884. The figures for the other years will be seen by the table. During the last year, ending June 30, 1887, the balance of trade swung against us to the extent of $309,658, and this year, ending June 30, 1888, as I have already stated, the balance of trade against us is over $40,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. I would like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he is giving merchandise alone or merchandise together with gold and silver.

Mr. SHERMAN. The figures I have given include gold and silver with merchandise. I have given the aggregates from the reports. The merchandise alone will show the same results, except a less amount, because generally the fluctuation of gold and silver follows that of merchandise. The tables that I have before me, and which I will hand to the Reporter, will show the amount of gold and silver and merchandise separately and the distinction between them.

Mr. HALE. What was the balance for the whole of the last fiscal year up to July 1?

Mr. SHERMAN. Forty millions, eight hundred and forty-eight thousand, nine hundred and seventy-seven dollars was the excess of imports for that year.

Mr. BECK. Of which thirty-three millions were gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. When? For last year or for what time?

Mr. BECK. For last year—the year ending June 30, 1888.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken in the year. I will read it here. The figures I have show the difference between the exports of merchandise and of gold coin and bullion. The excess of imports of gold and silver over exports for fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, was $33,209,414, but not for the last fiscal year.

Mr. BECK. That is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. But including imports and exports of gold and silver the balance of trade against us for the last fiscal year was forty-odd million dollars.

Mr. BECK. Including that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BECK. Of which thirty-three millions were gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, in 1887. But I say over and above the gold we imported the balance of trade against us, if you are correct, would be seventy-odd millions; but of course gold and silver is part of the business of the country.

Mr. HALE. You do not mean to say that the balance of merchandise would be seventy-odd millions?

Mr. SHERMAN. It would be according to the figures of the Senator from Kentucky. My attention had not been called to the very large amount of gold and silver imported last year, as stated by him.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator should give the amount of exports of merchandise independently of the amount of gold and silver, and then give gold and silver separately.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will turn to the tables he will find the figures.

Mr. TELLER. I have them; but as the Senator is putting these figures in the RECORD he ought to give them, I think, in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the figures of both consolidated, but the tables that I now present will show them separately up to and including the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will let me complete my statement.

Mr. GEORGE. I merely want to ask a question for information. When the Senator from Ohio speaks of valuations of imports and of exports I desire to ask him at what place and by what standard the valuations are made? Are the exports and imports valued at the same place?

Mr. SHERMAN. The exports are always valued at the place of exportation, and the imports are valued at the place whence imported.

Mr. FRYE. Are they not undervalued?

Mr. GEORGE. The imports into this country, say, if from England, are valued, as I am to understand it, according to the place in England from which imported?

Mr. SHERMAN. The last place of shipment.

Mr. GEORGE. And the exports from this country are valued, if I understand the Senator, according to the values in, say, New York or New Orleans, or whatever port they may be shipped from?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. I comprehend the question of the Senator from Mississippi, and I will say that our imports are estimated by the valuation abroad at the last port of shipment; but our importations for years have been confessedly enormously undervalued.

The report of the subcommittee of the Finance Committee, of which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] are members, established beyond doubt that to a large extent our imports were undervalued, and if imports were put at what they estimate to have been the value the amount of the balance of trade against us would during the last fiscal year be over $100,000,000.

Mr. CULLOM. Of merchandise?

Mr. SHERMAN. Of merchandise. That is somewhat altered by including gold and silver bullion; but taking all things together and allowing for undervaluation of imports there is no doubt that the balance of foreign trade is against us by over $100,000,000.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, but I do not wish to be led off now.

Mr. BLAIR. I will not lead the Senator off. I would like to know if there is any complaint of the undervaluation of exports?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; there is no motive for that. One of the tables I have submitted shows the exports and imports for the last ten or fifteen years; but our imports have been very largely undervalued, and on that basis the balance of trade against us is fully a hundred million dollars.

I do not intend to go into the argument that is derived from this, because Senators would take different views of that. I simply wish to present the facts from the public record. If asked what was the cause of this I would say it was excessive importations; but then that would lead us off into a vast field of controversy, and I do not wish to go into it now. We will have ample time for that. But the fact is that Senators must remember that they are now dealing with the public Treasury at a time when the balance of trade is against us, which always has been an important factor in the history of American finances.

In 1837, after the surplus in the Treasury had been distributed among the States, or was being distributed, a sudden revulsion occurred by a change in the balance of trade, so that Congress had to suspend the operation of the law for the distribution of the public money. In 1857 I was here legislating to reduce the tariff—aiding to do it. We went away from here with a surplus in the Treasury. We came back the following session and had to provide for the issuance of Treasury notes to pay the salaries of members of Congress. The fact that there was a long-continued balance of trade against us prior to 1873 has always been looked upon as a potential reason for the revulsion of that year. And Senators must face the fact given to us by the Treasury statements, that we now contemplate and stand in view of a large balance of trade against us. What ought to be done in consequence of that I am not now here to answer.

There is one other fact that I wish to place on public record, and that is that the present Administration has changed somewhat, in one important feature, the financial policy of the Government hitherto. In the deposit of public money, ever since the law was passed making a subtreasury, as it was called, the money of the people of the United States has been stored in the custody of officers of the Government. That was so far modified by the national-banking act that the national banks might be and could be, at the will of the Secretary of the Treasury, made depositories of public money, and so they continued to be, and for a period of years they were convenient agencies for the deposit of internal taxes, and they were confined to internal taxes or receipts, because the law especially provided that customs duties should not be deposited with national banks, but should be deposited in the Treasury.

Internal-revenue taxes, however, and receipts from public lands and from the sale of bonds, which were internal transactions—that money might be deposited in the national banks which were designated depositories. That was the policy, and so it continued until now. After these depositories were established the deposits varied from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000 for a period of years, but during the enormous funding operations of the Government in 1877 to 1879 the deposits of the national banks were enormous, made as I say, in the process of changing the loan—a matter that I endeavored to explain to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] the other day.

I will now read to the Senate the balances at the different periods of time, because sometimes the course of the present Secretary of the Treasury is justified on the ground that in previous times the balances on deposit in national banks were much larger than they are now. That is true. But up to 1877 the balances rarely exceeded $10,000,000, and the deposits came by natural driblets into these banks from tax-payers through the internal revenue. In 1877, 1878, 1879 these deposits ran up in the process of refunding $800,000,000 of bonds. When the law itself required that the money should be withheld and should not be used for ninety days, then these deposits ran up.

As I have said, prior to 1876 the deposits ranged from five to fifteen million dollars—never exceeded $15,000,000 I believe. On the 1st of February, 1879—that was a month after resumption, when the process of refunding was going on rapidly—the deposits reached $166,351,141. On the 1st of July, 1879, right in the midst of this process, they reached $201,402,860. That was about the close of the refunding operation. On the 1st of October, 1879, in the same year, to show how rapidly this money was withdrawn in the process of paying, the deposits held by the national banks were $17,341,224, showing that at once when the process of refunding had been ended the normal condition was restored. So also November 1, 1880, during the same administration, the deposits held by the national banking depositories were reduced to $12,217,571.

Mr. PAYNE. Eighteen hundred and seventy-nine was the year of resumption, was it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. This last date quoted was a year afterward. The 1st of January, 1879, was the period of resumption, and the refunding was mostly in that same year. I will give the figures for each year, taking them at haphazard as to particular dates. On the 1st of October, 1881, in Mr. Arthur's administration, the deposits held by the national banking depositories were $13,412,848. On the 1st of November, 1882, the deposits held by national banking depositories were $12,709,660. On the 31st of December, 1883 (I am taking these figures without regard to months), the deposits held in national banking depositories were $13,313,080. On the 29th of November, 1884, the deposits held by the national banking depositories were $13,559,033.

And now, Mr. President, let me come to a later year. On the 21st of July, 1886, which was before the recent operations commenced, the deposits in national banking depositories were $15,694,214. On the 30th of April, 1887, the deposits in the national banking depositories were somewhat increased, amounting then to $20,747,365—during the period of Mr. Manning's administration of the Treasury Department, if I remember correctly the date. On the 31st of December, 1887, the amount had risen to $52,199,917. On the 31st day of July, 1888, it had risen to $59,681,672, and this was by money transferred into the national bank depositories.

The object of that I have no doubt was plausible and reasonable, but I wish to show the effect of it, not with any desire at all to reflect on the conduct of Mr. Fairchild. The object was this: As there was a large accumulation of money in the Treasury it was thought best to deposit it in these banking depositories so that it might be in circulation among the people. That is the reason given in his report for it—that the money might not be entirely withdrawn from the people. But, Mr. President, the result of that has been in every instance to contract the currency of the country instead of to enlarge it.

How has that come? I called the other day for a list of the various depositories where these large sums of money were deposited, and that list is upon our table. I do not care to go into the names of the banks, or to go into anything at all of a personal character in regard to it. The money is deposited very largely in the State and city of New York, but the result is this, that many of the banks that received these deposits surrendered their circulation, deposited greenbacks in the Treasury of the United States, in order that they might get possession of their bonds held as security for their circulating notes; then took those same bonds, deposited them with the Treasurer of the United States as security for deposits, and received a much larger amount of deposits than they surrendered of circulation. For instance, many of these banks held $1,000,000 of deposits or thereabouts—almost exactly that sum.

Mr. ALLISON. One million one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, the amount of deposits with several of the banks is $1,100,000. I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa. The amount deposited in several of the banks is $1,100,000, varying a little probably from time to time as drafts are drawn. These deposits are secured by a million of dollars of United States bonds. The law leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury what security shall be required, and I feel bound to say that he in no case has taken any other securities except national bonds according to the terms of the law.

But, sir, suppose a bank seeking these deposits having circulating notes outstanding amounting to $900,000 should surrender that circulation, or, rather, deposit greenbacks in the Treasury of the United States for their redemption, and demand the million of United States bonds held for their redemption and receive them, and then turn right around to the same official and deposit the same $1,000,000 of United States bonds with him, and should receive $1,100,000 as a Government deposit without interest, with the understanding that it should not be drawn upon. What is the effect of that operation?

The deposit of greenbacks in the Treasury of the United States ties them up, and they can not be paid out except in redemption of outstanding notes of the particular bank that has made this deposit, so that the greenbacks are tied up in the Treasury and are a part of the nearly $100,000,000 of greenbacks now lying idle in the Treasury.

Mr. PAYNE. May I inquire of my colleague whether these transactions are not perfectly according to law? Has not a bank a perfect right to reduce its circulation and redeem its bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. No doubt of it. No doubt it is clearly within the language of the law, but it seems to me it is not a wise exercise of discretionary power to encourage this process by the tempting offer of Government deposits.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary power to refuse the redemption of bank notes?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; the Secretary can not refuse the deposit of United States notes and the withdrawal of bonds, but he should not induce that withdrawal by the tempting offer of depositing with that same bank $1,100,000 of Government money, in effect relieving the bank from the burden of redeeming its notes and giving it without interest or cost two hundred thousand more than their circulating notes, a clear gain of the interest on $200,000.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it intended by my colleague to make the charge that the Secretary of the Treasury colluded with the banks?

Mr. SHERMAN. I make no charge against the Secretary of the Treasury except to say that he has pursued a line of policy which led to precisely what I have stated.

Mr. PAYNE. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator let me go a little further?

To have that fifty-nine or sixty million dollars in the banks, in case of any revulsion, any disturbance, any panic, would be the most dangerous form in which the money of the United States or the money of any one could be placed, because the very moment that that should be drawn upon—and it could only be drawn upon in an emergency—by the Treasurer of the United States, then the banks would be compelled to draw on their customers, and thus these $59,000,000 loaned out and in active use among the people, being called upon suddenly on an emergency, might create a very dangerous and serious condition of affairs.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I understand fully the right of the holder of a greenback to present it and that the Treasurer is bound to take it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And I understand that any one holding a Government bond can present it, but I also understand that a bank which has on deposit say one million 4 per cent. bonds, can take $1,000,000 of greenbacks——

Mr. SHERMAN. It could take one million one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And withdraw that bond which the bank had given as security for the special deposit. I do not know but what that is correct. But if they present their greenbacks and demand the bonds which they gave as security for the deposit made with them, has not the Secretary of the Treasury the right to return the money?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think my friend from Delaware is either a little mixed up, or I am.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I may be a little mixed up, but I say that the Secretary of the Treasury having made a deposit upon national bonds as security, if the owner of the bonds has deposited them for security, and chooses to deposit greenbacks for them, it is competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to withdraw the deposit which is made in the bank.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury can withdraw the deposit and can break up every one of those banks, if he will—unless they are very strong. There is no want of power in the Secretary of the Treasury. But the transaction is this: Suppose a bank has $900,000 of its notes in circulation. The bonds deposited with the Comptroller of the Currency to secure this circulation must be $1,000,000. Suppose the bank thinks it is better to hold a Government deposit of $1,100,000 of public money without any expectation of paying it, rather than to have outstanding $900,000 of bank notes which it is bound to redeem at any moment and for which it is bound to maintain a deposit in the Treasury of 5 per cent. in greenbacks, and is bound to secure also by money held in its vaults. Every bank in the United States that could get these deposits was tempted by that policy to withdraw its circulation. The easy way to do this is by depositing in the Treasury greenbacks to the full amount of its notes outstanding. Then the Government assumes the redemption of these outstanding bank notes. So far the law allows; but by this new policy the bank is permitted to withdraw its bonds from the Treasury and deposit them with the Treasurer of the United States, and immediately after that secures a deposit of $1,100,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. You say it received a deposit of $1,100,000. Will the Senator explain how?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bank receives that deposit.

Mr. ALLISON. From the Government?

Mr. SHERMAN. From the Government—public money.

Mr. COCKRELL. It received a deposit of 10 per cent. over and above the face of the bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly. This table shows exactly what amount of bonds is deposited and what amount of money is received.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Ohio state what the market value of the securities was that the banks placed in the Treasury? Four per cent. bonds are selling to-day at 128.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, undoubtedly; but the Senate and House of Representatives refused to enlarge the amount of circulating notes that could be issued on that security, which is 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited. The Secretary of the Treasury exercising his power takes $1,000,000 of securities for $1,100,000 of Government money deposited.

Mr. McPHERSON. But not upon the 4 percents, but upon the 4½ percents, which have confessedly not so high a market value. Hence a bank which surrenders its own circulation and takes up its bond deposits, in reality leaves with the Treasury of the United States $128 in bonds for every $110 it gets in circulation. Now let me ask the Senator——

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, I shall have to decline to yield further, because I want to get through.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not. If I have the right to close, I will do it and will then give the Senator the floor.

I have stated the question, and I do not care to go into a colloquy with my friend from New Jersey. I only care to state a few facts and leave them with the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Has not the Senator made a mistake with regard to the balance of trade being against us? That question is very important.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I have, I should like to be convinced of it.

Mr. BECK. I was somewhat surprised when I heard the statement, and so I went to the room of the Committee on Finance to get an account of the imports and exports of the United States for the twelve months ending June 30, 1888, and I have the official figures here at page 7 of this report, in which the total imports of the United States are given at $723,879,813.

Mr. SHERMAN. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. BECK. From page 7 of the "Summary statement of the imports and exports of the United States for the twelve months ending the 30th of June, 1888." Page 7 gives the total imports as I have read them.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is merchandise.

Mr. BECK. Merchandise.

Mr. SHERMAN. My figures give the gold and silver as well as the merchandise.

Mr. BECK. Wait a moment. I want to be right about this. Page 13 of that summary statement gives the total exports of the United States at $683,862,236, the net excess of imports being $40,017,577. Page 18 gives the exports of re-exported foreign merchandise which are embraced in the imports and which amount to $12,092,403. The difference between $40,017,577 and $12,092,403 is $27,925,174. Then follow that up with the gold and silver exports and imports given at page 25. On that page it is shown that we exported $12,560,084 in gold and imported $43,934,317 in gold, making a difference of $31,374,233 of imports above exports, and making a balance of trade in our favor of some millions instead of anything against us.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky will turn over to the next page, page 26, he will see the consolidated statement of merchandise and of gold and silver coin and bullion at the bottom of the page.

I stated that I gave the combined statement, and here it is—the figures as I have them: The total of imports is $783,217,799; the total of exports, coin being included, $742,368,822. Does the Senator see it? The balance, as I have stated, is precisely $40,848,977.

Mr. BECK. From which deducting the exports of foreign merchandise, over $12,000,000, leaves a difference of $27,925,000. Then the gold figures ($31,000,000) leave a balance of trade in our favor, not against us.

Mr. SHERMAN. But here is the consolidated statement of merchandise, gold and silver coin and bullion, and I give the result. There can be no mistake about it.

Mr. BECK. There can be no mistake in the statement that the exports are $683,000,000 and the imports $723,000,000, of which $12,000,000 was a re-export of foreign merchandise. That left $27,000,000 against us on the merchandise and $31,500,000 in our favor with the gold added, making several million dollars balance of trade in our favor, or every official figure I have is wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, the Senator is mistaken. This statement for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, may be entered in the RECORD. The figures are here. He has included the imports of gold and silver of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, in the imports of the year following.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Ohio will bear in mind that in the month of July every year there is a great falling off in exports and an increase in imports, because that is in advance of any cotton sales, of any wheat, and of any provisions, and so of all the things that make up our exports, of which nearly 90 per cent. are agricultural products, none of which are ready to go forward in July. There are the figures.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have given the figures for the year ending 31st July, and also for the year ending 30th June. There is the consolidated statement, and there can be no mistake about it. I have the statement for last month from Mr. Switzler, showing the same condition of affairs on the basis of the year ending 31st July—the balance of trade against us being $44,484,650, being four million more than it was on the 30th of June. I think that the more correct statement. What the Senator says is true, that in July in the ordinary course of trade merchandise is coming here more rapidly and our exports are largely agricultural.

Mr. BECK. The merchandise coming here in July for the fall trade is always very large. It is so every year.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it must be remembered in giving the statement for the 31st of July I left out July of last year, so that this is as broad as it is long. The difference in July of this year would be the same as in July of last year. The figures I have quoted show a balance of trade against us of over forty millions. That is all I desire to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say a word before the vote is taken, in partial response to the query of the Senator from Ohio on my left [Mr. PAYNE] when he asked his colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] whether the transactions which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was describing were not lawful transactions. The Senator from Ohio answered that they were, as they undoubtedly are; that is to say, they are not in violation of law. The transaction described by the Senator from Ohio, wherein a bank surrenders its circulation by a deposit of greenbacks and the withdrawal of bonds and then immediately redeposits those bonds with the Treasurer and secures a deposit from the Government, is lawful; but all that, or at least a part of it, can be prevented if the Secretary of the Treasury does not want it done. There is no collusion between the bank and the Secretary, but the Secretary need not do that thing unless he wants to do it, and therefore to that extent in every case where it has been done it must have been done by an arrangement between the Treasury Department and the bank.

Mr. PAYNE. The Senator will allow me to say that I did not hear any intimation from my colleague that there was any collusion in this matter between the bank whose circulation was taken up and retired and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not say there was any collusion.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not see the difference. I can not see where the danger comes, whether it is done by a bank that has taken up its circulation or a bank that has not taken it up.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to explain further, if the Senator will allow me, that no bank can become a national depository unless the Secretary of the Treasury so designates it.

Mr. PAYNE. That is true, and it must deposit bonds as security.

Mr. ALLISON. If there are two or three national banks in the city of Washington, for example, or in the city of Cleveland, and those national banks go to the Treasury and say, "Here, we want to deposit $100,000 of bonds and receive public deposits," the Secretary of the Treasury can say to every one of them "I do not designate you for that purpose," or he can say to one of them "I designate you and I exclude the others."

Mr. PAYNE. That is true.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore I say that the arrangement suggested by the Senator from Ohio, wherein national banks have been able with a capital of $1,000,000 and a circulation of $900,000 to enhance their available loanable funds $200,000, could not be carried out except in the exercise of the discretion which is in the Secretary of the Treasury alone, and I understand the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] to say that it is a wise discretion on behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury to allow that thing to be done. I think it is an unwise discretion if it is done.

Mr. PAYNE. Does he do it?

Mr. ALLISON. It has been done.

Mr. PAYNE. The Secretary of the Treasury has not been in collusion with any bank by which that interchange could be made. I personally know that banks in my own city have surrendered their circulation without any such understanding or arrangement with the bank that it would deposit bonds and receive Government deposits.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President, suppose you carry that to its logical conclusion. There is now only about $160,000,000 of national-bank circulation in existence; that is to say, all in excess of $160,000,000 is represented by greenbacks deposited in the Treasury. Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury should take a bank in Cleveland that is not a public depository, and that bank should apply to the Secretary for the surrender of its bonds by the deposit of greenbacks. The Secretary, of course, has no option about that. A bank can do that whether he wants it done or not. That bank the moment it does that says to the Secretary of the Treasury that day, "I have done this in order that my bank may become a public depository, and I want now to redeposit these bonds."

Mr. PAYNE. He may do it, but has he done it?

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I am showing now that he may do it. These bonds may be re-deposited, and this identical bank instead of having 90 per cent. on its bonds has 110 per cent.

Mr. PAYNE. How does that affect the currency?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not discussing that question now. I am not saying a word about the currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a contraction of the currency because the greenbacks are locked up.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to travel into that.

Now, then, in the case of this particular bank the national-bank circulation is out of the bank and is represented by greenbacks in the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury can do that with one bank. He has done it with more than one bank. If he can do that in that way with the amount of money that there is now in the Treasury, it can practically be done in six months with half the bank circulation in the United States. That may be wise financial discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury, but I must say that I do not think it is wise, and I am glad to say that as I understand the Secretary of the Treasury has ceased to do it. I think he has not done this or allowed it to be done for the last three or four months, and I do not know but that he stopped it when his personal attention was first called to it.

Mr. PAYNE. When a bank wishes to take up its circulation and deposits greenbacks sufficient to do it and takes up its bonds and deposits or sells the bonds or makes any other disposition of them, it has no necessary connection and no practical connection with the speculation which follows. The transactions have no necessary connection with each other.

I have known of transactions with three or four banks in my own city, and there is not one of them that did not take up bonds and sell them on account of the great premium paid on them.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose that a bank was to do that thing——

Mr. PAYNE. You suppose that to be dishonest and speculative?

Mr. ALLISON. It has been done.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not only has it been done, but I feel bound to say that the officers of the Treasury must know when these same bonds come back that it has been done.

Mr. PAYNE. How do they know they are the same bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are all registered bonds, and the officers of the Treasury know them by their numbers.

Mr. PAYNE. The numbers would show which bonds they were.

Mr. SHERMAN. Consequently they know they are the same bonds that have been surrendered, and everybody can jump at the conclusion how it is done.

Mr. PAYNE. The Secretary may go into speculation under the law if so disposed. In three or four cases where that occurred in my own city, to my personal knowledge such was not the case, and there was no intimation of any collusion with the Secretary. I do not believe there was.

Mr. BECK. I only want to say a word. There is not a doubt about the fact that there is a very bad condition of things on account of money loaned to national banks and the people to whom they belong, but it is quite as bad to lock it up in the Treasury where nobody can get it, quite as bad to have to pay $129 for every $100 we owe to the bondholders, and there is but one remedy and we may as well apply ourselves to it. The President has stated, and it is confessed, that all these things are bad and he has called upon Congress to remedy them. There is but one way to remedy them and that is to reduce taxation, and we are struggling to do that wherever we can. The House of Representatives has sent us a bill that does it to the extent of $80,000,000 or $90,000,000 and we can make it $100,000,000. Why not address ourselves now to that and relieve the condition of things which the President and everybody else says is deplorable? That is the true remedy.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] called attention to the balance of trade. He said the balance of trade was against us during the fiscal years 1870, 1871, and up to 1872; but the balance of trade was in our favor after the disasters of 1873, and in 1874 and 1875 we had the balance in our favor, and we are falling off again now. What is the meaning of that? When a man is prosperous and finds that he is making money he builds up and improves his estate. So with a government. We built 10,000 miles of railroad last year in this country. A man who gets money spends it and puts it into improvements so as to make more money; but when he gets into such a condition as we were in in 1873 and 1875, with tramps abroad in the land, when nobody could do any business, when everything was black, and the demonetization of silver followed, of course the balance of trade was in our favor, and nobody dared to spend money. Everybody knew that if he invested in anything it would be worth 10 per cent. less the next year than it was the year he made the investment. Will anybody invest under those circumstances? Of course not. The poorer we are the less we buy, and the richer we are the surer we are to buy a good piece of property for investment; and that is all there is of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CALL. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa before the vote is taken on this report of the committee of conference if he will not agree to have the amendments of the Senate in relation to the Treasury building continued in the conference. I have had my attention called to this by a number of officials of the Department, with the assurance that the amendments which were put upon the bill by the Senate Committee on Appropriations were absolutely necessary to the continuance of that building in a proper condition for the public service. They amount to a very small sum, but I see the committee of conference have disagreed to them and have agreed to the provision of the House bill as it came here. Now, I understand that these appropriations are absolutely necessary. I was in the Treasury Department a few days ago and my attention was called to it and to the fact that the repairs which are required can not be had unless you use the language put in the bill by the Senate Committee on Appropriations in amendment numbered 36, which reads:

Including employment of plumbers, carpenters, and painters, and materials for their use, $8,265.

While in the original bill it was only $1,000, the Senate amendment numbered 38 provided:

For repairing, filling, and painting the east front of the Treasury building, $10,000.

That, perhaps, is not so absolutely necessary, though I understand that it is required by the Department; but the other, the employment of plumbers and carpenters, I have been informed by the officers in charge of this work, is absolutely necessary for the comfort of the inmates and the preservation of the building. I invite the attention of the Senator from Iowa to that.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the matter of which the Senator from Florida speaks was very thoroughly considered by the conferees on the part of the Senate, and the House conferees simply stated that they would not agree to these amendments, and as they relate to the current operations of the Treasury and relate merely to expenditures for repairs the Senate conferees did not feel that they were called upon to insist to the extent of losing this bill, and therefore we surrendered.

Mr. CALL. I am informed that the Secretary of the Treasury has called the attention specially of the two Houses of Congress to this specific matter.

Mr. ALLISON. The Secretary of the Treasury did so. He called the attention of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to it in a letter, and the chief clerk of the Treasury came before us and made his statement, and our judgment was in accord with the judgment of the Secretary and the chief clerk; but the House of Representatives declined to agree to the amendments, and we certainly could not force them without the consent of the House, and we surrendered them, as we did a great many amendments which we should have been glad to retain.

Mr. CALL. I wish for myself to say that where a matter is absolutely necessary to the lives and the comfort of the people engaged in the public business, I think it is the duty of the Senate to hold on to their judgment in that respect, and if it be necessary that the matter should go before the country in any question which concerns absolutely the good health and the lives and the efficient performance of the public duty; so small a matter as this, called by the officers in charge pointedly to the attention of Congress, I really think the committee of conference on the part of the Senate should insist on the amendments. For myself I should never vote to surrender a proposition of that character.

Mr. BECK. We had a very long consultation over that matter. Both the Secretary of the Treasury and the chief clerk came before us, and they made it appear to us that a portion of the work they desired to have done was almost indispensable, and we not only went so far as to retain those things, but we determined, if the other House would not give us all, to pick out the most needful, and we urged in two or three meetings to have them provided for. The Senate conferees tried to have the most necessary items provided for, but the House conferees assured us that they would not and could not agree to them, and great bills, involving the whole running machinery of the Government, can not be stopped for matters of that kind. A majority of the House of Representatives being Democratic, I being a Democrat, and there being a Democratic Administration, I thought if they would not consent to the decent running of their own Administration in matters of comfort for themselves and their own employés, we were compelled to yield and let the responsibility be upon the men who refuse to give the money needed. All the Senate conferees can possibly do is to insist fairly upon the Senate amendments.

When they have done that, the bill must be closed in some way. When we can not get all we want, we must get the most needful things. We meet again in December, and in the mean time the House can look over these matters and then provide for them. But at present they were not prepared to do it, and we could not block the wheels of the Government and stop the whole bill because of an appropriation of ten or fifteen thousand dollars for repairs of the Treasury Department, the greater part of which is for painting on the outside. It is a very shabby looking concern on the outside now, and we thought by the 4th of March next, no matter who shall be elected President, when the American people come here to witness the inauguration, we should like to have the outside of that building look a little more genteel than it does now.

Mr. CALL. I did not refer to the matter of painting or the appearance of the outside of the Treasury building, but to what I am assured is necessary for the interior. I understand there are matters which are to be referred again to the committee of conference——

Mr. ALLISON. There are several matters to be further considered in conference.

Mr. CALL. I had some reason to believe if the chairman of the committee would assent to this suggestion, in view of the emergency and of the pressing character of the representations that are being made now to the conferees of the House, that it would be agreed to. That was the reason I made the suggestion.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Florida that after the second conference on these amendments we stated to the gentlemen of the House, "Now, we will adjourn this conference and you may go to the Treasury Department and investigate this matter for yourselves, and we believe that when you return you will agree to the amendments." They came back and at the next meeting of the conference they declined to yield to anything, and we surrendered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is compelled to be absent and desires to submit some remarks on the report of the committee of conference, and I trust it will not be acted upon this evening.

I have been infinitely amused and delighted, as I doubt not the country has been and will be, at the masquerading which has been performed to-day by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in their efforts to make the people believe that we are upon a financial crisis, just hovering over the brink of it, and that our surplus revenues are being exhausted, and therefore no tariff legislation can be brought into this Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Why, Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. When did I say in any remarks I made that we were approaching a financial crisis?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am speaking of you both together as part of the great Republican party, distinguished leaders of the party.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator from Missouri should be a little more compact in his statements.

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, I will be a little more compact.

Mr. ALLISON. Or a little more diffuse. I did not enter into the subject of our financial situation at all, except simply to state the condition of the appropriations. I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it was the President of the United States who sounded the alarm last December about the financial situation of the Government.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand all about that. In other words, these two distinguished leaders of the Republican party each had his part to perform upon the stage in order to produce an effect throughout the country. This thing commenced a long time ago, when Mr. Depew returned from the West, on a trip out there, and had an interview and had to correct it time and again. It was for the purpose of producing a financial crisis, it was for the purpose of producing a stringency in the money market, and making the people believe that there was no necessity for the reduction of the revenue which had been recommended by the President of the United States.

After they have had here since the 23d of July a tariff bill which proposes a reduction of the revenue, the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, gets up in an elaborate way and undertakes to show that in consequence of the immense appropriations that have been made there will be no surplus left.

Mr. ALLISON. I made no statement respecting the surplus, except the fact, and I made no statement that could be tortured into a discussion of the tariff.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why labor so assiduously to show the great appropriations that have been made unless it was for the purpose of exhausting the surplus?

Mr. ALLISON. If I may be permitted to say why I did it, I will say that I did it for two reasons: first, because it has been charged publicly elsewhere that the Senate is responsible for these great appropriations; and secondly, because in another branch of this Government—I will not say where—these appropriations were carefully adjusted and arranged and were handed around among leading Democrats everywhere in this Chamber and in the House of Representatives, in order to have the effect that certain bills which were pending should not pass. In other words, what was known only to the officials who have actual charge of these appropriations was disclosed by leading Democrats in order to make the Democratic party call a halt. These matters became subjects of public discussion to such an extent that the candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the party of the Senator, in a public debate only the day before yesterday, with 40,000 people present, it is said, arraigned this Congress for its monstrous appropriations; and I think I am justified as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, in defense not only of that committee and of myself, but in defense also of the Senator from Missouri, who is a member of that committee and who is responsible for these appropriations, and all of them, as I am, to state exactly their condition and situation, and also to show that they are reasonable and proper appropriations, as I believe them to be, and also to show that they are in large part because of the fact that appropriations which ought to have been made a year ago were not made and for reasons which I did not give, but which the Senator from Missouri perfectly well knows. Now, therefore, when he chooses to say that I am masquerading here and playing a part for an ulterior political purpose, he makes a gratuitous statement which is not justified by anything that I have said or done on this floor to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, whatever may have been the intention of the distinguished Senator from Iowa, yet he performs a part of a plan which has been enacted to-day, and whether he has performed it intentionally or not is for him to say. He has performed a part of the plan which the distinguished Senator from Ohio has brought before the country, undertaking to show that our imports were in excess of our exports. Why parade this just at this time?

Mr. TELLER. Is it not a fact?

Mr. COCKRELL. Why bring this forth just on this particular occasion when the Finance Committee of the Senate, of which the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Ohio are both members, has a bill before it which proposes to reduce the revenue and to reduce it, I will say, in exact compliance with the recommendations and pledges of the Republican party made ever since 1868 by their Secretaries of the Treasury and by their platforms and by their Presidents in their messages, and by the distinguished leaders of the party? I say it looks to me as if it was a part of a plan, taken in connection with the speech of the distinguished ex-Senator from Maine, "the uncrowned king of the Republican party," and the reckless, impetuous leader of that party, not always discreet, in which he undertook to tell the people of this country, since his return from Europe, that we are in a crisis, we are having a stringency. That is the sound he sends forth.

Only a short time ago it was Mr. Depew, a Presidential aspirant, who told the country that we were in the throes of hard times, and now after the ex-Senator from Maine has issued his proclamation to the country that the country was prosperous last year, but is not prosperous this year, then the Senator from Iowa gets up and makes his statement in regard to the expenditures, and then the Senator from Ohio comes in with an elaborate statement to show that we are approaching a crisis of some kind, he will not say exactly what it is, but here it is—"here are the imports and here are the exports," and then he goes on to tell what was the effect in 1837 and what was the effect in 1873.

Mr. President, why did not the distinguished Senator from Ohio tell the country what it was that caused an excess of exports over imports?

Did it ever occur to the distinguished Senator from Ohio that that never happened until the tidal wave that brought the Democratic party into the ascendency in the House of Representatives in 1874? Look at your record. If we are going to account for these things, let us have some little accounting on fair principles.

Mr. President, we have a surplus in the Treasury. It is there by unnecessary, burdensome taxation, and the appropriations made at this session of Congress will not exhaust that surplus. The surplus will remain, and there will still exist a necessity, an imperative necessity, for the reduction of that surplus, and that reduction must be made by a change in the tariff or in the internal-revenue laws, and a measure of relief is now before the Finance Committee of the Senate and has been there for a long, long, long time.

Mr. ALLISON. But why speak of it to-day? Why should the Senator speak of that to-day?

Mr. COCKRELL. Because of the performance——

Mr. ALLISON. Oh!

Mr. COCKRELL. Because of the performance on the stage by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Iowa to-day. That is all.

Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope we shall get through with the consideration of this report to-night.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is very anxious to make some remarks on the report and he is engaged in a committee of conference and can not proceed to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, then; I shall not press it to-night.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 34, insisted upon by the Senate, agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. TOWNSHEND, Mr. SAYERS, and Mr. RYAN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Susan B. Hopkins, widow of Arvah Hopkins, late of Tallahassee, Fla., deceased; and

A bill (S. 2197) empowering and directing the Commissioner of Navigation to register and enroll as American vessels certain sailing-vessels of foreign construction repaired in the port of Cleveland, Ohio, and named the Josephine and M. C. Tupper, respectively.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 29, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate August 28, 1888.

PROBATE JUDGES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 28, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a correction of the RECORD of this morning.

On yesterday, when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] introduced his bill with reference to the duty on cotton-bagging, he asked unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means, to which it was referred, might have the right to report at any time. The RECORD quotes me as saying "I object."

My exact words were, and I am not surprised that they were not caught in the confusion then prevailing, "Oh, no; they have that privilege now."

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. I see that my friend, General HOOKER, is now in his seat. He was not present a moment ago when the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] referred to what took place when my colleague introduced a bill on yesterday. I only invite attention to it now in order that the matter may go into the RECORD, as it ought to go.

Before my colleague from Mississippi entered the Hall the gentleman from New Jersey rose to a correction of the RECORD, stating the facts which occurred on yesterday, that my colleague when he introduced his bill asked consent that the committee should have leave to report at any time, to which request the gentleman from New Jersey is reported as having objected. This language he corrects in the RECORD, and applies other language, the exact words of which I can not now recall, but the substance of which is to the effect that the committee has the right asked by my colleague under the rules.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My exact words were, "Oh, no; they have that privilege now."

Mr. ROGERS. The parliamentary inquiry I wanted to suggest was this: If the language of the gentleman from New Jersey did not in fact amount to an objection, ought not the RECORD be made to conform to that understanding, so as to show that the request of my colleague was granted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does not amount to an objection, on the ground stated by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If there is any doubt about it, I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. HOOKER. I will state that I do not know, of course, what occurred before entering the Hall, but I understand that under the rules of the House, this being a privileged matter, the committee would have the right to report in the face of an objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the rules of the House the Committee on Ways and Means have the right to report revenue bills at any time.

Mr. HOOKER. That was my understanding; but I desired to call the attention of the House to this matter especially, to impress it upon the mind of the committee and of the House so as to facilitate action upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. They have the right to report at any time.

Mr. ROGERS. I was not sure when I made the inquiry to what committee this was referred. I see now, however, that having gone to the Committee on Ways and Means that privilege is in the committee.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House certain personal requests of members, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GROSVENOR asks leave of absence for ten days, on account of engagements of a personal character.
Mr. DE LANO asks leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.
Mr. STEWART, of Texas, asks indefinite leave of absence.
Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, requests leave of absence for ten days, on account of urgent and important business.
Mr. HEMPHILL requests leave of absence, on account of sickness.
Mr. HOUK asks indefinite leave of absence, on account of sickness.
Mr. MCRAE asks indefinite leave of absence, on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these several requests?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I object. This question has been discussed a good deal on the floor of the House, and if we are going to carry out the order of the House made on Friday last, I shall object to all leaves of absence except in cases of sickness. The question may be raised on a motion; but I think it is due to us, who also have important engagements, to know whether it is the intention of the House to insist upon the order as heretofore made or not, so that we may determine what to do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky to object to all leaves of absence except in cases of sickness, or where there is sickness in the family of the member?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object in any case of personal sickness of the member asking the leave, or where there is sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the requests for leaves of absence where this condition applies.

The Clerk read as follows:

Leave of absence is asked in the following cases:
Mr. HOUK, indefinitely, on account of sickness;
Mr. DE LANO, indefinitely, on account of sickness;
Mr. MCRAE, indefinitely, because of sickness in his family; and
Mr. HEMPHILL, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these several requests?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the other requests to which objection has been made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GROSVENOR requests leave of absence for ten days, on account of engagements of a personal character.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I suppose a motion that this leave of absence be granted would be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I make that motion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to make a statement to the House so that this matter can be settled definitely with a frank understanding of the facts by the House.

Before this revocation order, or whatever it was, made by the House the other day, I had made engagements covering the next week, as a good many others have done; but I did not put into my request for leave that it was on account of sickness; for while I am personally not perhaps a robust person, I am not suffering with any illness, and I do not call it "professional" business because it is not strictly of that character. Frankly, I have engaged to go to the State of Maine to make some speeches at places indicated to me, beginning on Saturday afternoon next and running up to the end of the campaign. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER. Had not the gentleman better stay here and make his campaign speeches?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Iowa will please take care of his own business, a cheap-John attempt at personal notoriety, and I will take care of mine.

I want the House to vote squarely upon this question. I desire to go. I made the engagement at a time when any member would have made a similar appointment without any hesitation. No opposition had been made by anybody and a good many are away already on the same mission. The distinguished Democratic candidate for Vice-President has had in his train a very distinguished coterie of members of the House, and I am very glad to see that side of the House out already.

Mr. BLAND. In the mean time the great leader of your party is already in Maine; and quite a number of others.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not rise to make a political speech; but if you will come up on Saturday you will have a first-class opportunity to hear a first-class political speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman proceeded to allude to the next Vice-President of the United States, and I thought there was a little politics in that. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to know whether we are to be compelled to be present here at the latter end of dog days and prevented from entering on engagements of a political character, but have to sit around here while——

Mr. BLAND. It is the same on both sides.

Mr. WEAVER. I want to say this about whether members are to be compelled to sit here in the latter end of dog days or be out making political speeches: I think they are compelled to stay here. That is their first obligation, and that is what they are sent here for. It is not fair to the balance of us to stay here and swelter through dog days when we have not a sufficient number of members here to transact the public business. If anybody is to go, let us all go.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I want to say in explanation of my objection to the granting of leave of absence to the gentleman from Ohio that it presents the question in a concrete form where we can see whether we are going to carry out the resolution passed last Saturday, and follow in the line of the language of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] when he said that he intended to see that a quorum appeared. Here is a distinguished gentleman from Ohio, of high character and of national reputation, who gives us the reason why he wants this leave of absence. I intend to vote for it; but I want to state that some of us having engagements of the same character have thought it necessary to cancel them because of the action of the House in revoking the leaves heretofore granted. We thought it our duty in obedience to this action, and in submission to the spirit of that resolution, to cancel these private engagements or these semi-public engagements. Knowing that gentlemen were going to make these requests, I thought we had better have this question sharply brought before the House, so that if one gentleman is to receive leave of absence on that ground it would be understood that all members of the House might go ahead and make these engagements with the understanding that it would be agreeable to the wishes of the House. That was the only object I had in making objection, and in making it in this concrete form.

It is not a difficult matter for any gentleman to object to the whole House without naming anybody. It is not a difficult matter for gentlemen to say they object, that everybody ought to be here; but it is somewhat an ungracious matter to make that general declaration personal in a concrete case, and we can only accomplish this avowed purpose of compelling the attendance of a quorum by doing that. Now, if we are going to do it, here is the fair opportunity on public grounds, by holding that attendance here is of higher importance than public speaking in the campaign, and then we will know the mind of the House and all of us regulate ourselves accordingly; or the House can grant the leave and then we can act on the hypothesis that the House approves these engagements.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I hope the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will be granted, for I will have to go next week myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in the matter of granting these leaves of absence it seems to me that the necessities for each case ought to appear, as in the case of sickness for instance. In a mere matter of going out upon a tour of speech-making it is not indicated whether it is a matter of necessity or not. For instance, the State to which the gentleman has been assigned is largely Republican, and the home of the most distinguished member of the party, and it would seem to me in this case it is apparent there is an absolute necessity for his presence in the State of Maine. [Laughter.]

Now, that ought to be one of the elements, it seems to me, in the matter of granting leaves.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to make an amendment that will do justice to members of both sides of the House and operate equally between them. I therefore move that every member of this House who files his own statement with the Clerk of the House stating that he wants to go out and make a few speeches may have leave to do so. That is fair and just; and if we are going to give one member leave we ought to give it to all, and they should file their requests with the Clerk of the House. Then we know where we are and what we are doing; and I move that as a substitute for the gentleman's motion.

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. That is all right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not care, in the language of a distinguished dead statesman of Illinois, whether that amendment is voted up or voted down; but it ought not to be put as a rider to this proposition for this reason——

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Make a point of order against it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That would do on a public bill; but this is a private matter. I should not have made this engagement if the resolution of the House had been adopted before I entered into it, and therefore my position is a little different from those who make these engagements hereafter. I say that that is not a fair amendment to my proposition for the reason that I would not have entered into this arrangement to go to Maine had the resolution revoking leaves of absence stood on the Journal at the time, but having made the arrangement at a time when nobody would have said that I was doing wrong, I do not now wish to forfeit it, and I make the constitutional objection to the order of the House that it impairs the force of a contract. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not know but I would consent to an amendment providing that this leave of absence should take me into the district of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON], because I take it that while he lives and moves and has a being there danger will always exist in that district.

As to the question whether there is necessity or danger in the State of Maine, that is not for me to decide nor for him. Maine is a good place to go to. A great many Democrats are going there, and it is said that $200,000 in money has gone ahead on the Democratic side. The greatest monopolist in New England, the president of the Maine Central Railroad, which runs into nearly every county in the State, is a member of the Democratic national executive committee, and if there is an opportunity for Democrats anywhere this year, which I honestly doubt, I should think that would be a pretty good stamping-ground for them.

Mr. WEAVER. Is it because so much money has gone ahead that the gentleman wants to go there? [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] had been assured of the statement which I have made about the money, he would have been there a long time ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER. The trouble is that we are never assured of any statement which the gentleman makes. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I hope this matter will be laid aside for the present. If the appropriation bills, and some other important measure which it is unnecessary to name at this time, can be disposed of during to-day, to-morrow, Thursday, and Friday, I shall then be in favor of granting leave of absence until Monday, September 10, to all members who desire to avail themselves of it, with the understanding that no business shall be done in the House in the mean time, this body being perhaps more than a week ahead of the Senate. But before that is done we must dispose of some necessary legislation, and if we begin now to grant these leaves of absence we shall be unable to do that and shall not be in a position to grant general leave. Therefore, with the view of bringing this matter to a conclusion, I move the previous question on the resolution and the amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. Let the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. It is not in writing. It is simply a motion made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] be excused.

Mr. MAISH. I understood that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] offered an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment pending, against which no point of order was made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the pending motion.

A MEMBER. Too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not stated the motion, and therefore the point of order is made in time. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] moved as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey that all members desiring leave of absence for the purpose of making political speeches be granted such leave upon filing their individual statements with the Clerk of the House.

Mr. HOOKER. I raise the point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. This is a personal request by a single member for leave of absence, upon the ground stated by him. The motion which the gentleman from Minnesota attempts to make as a substitute would be in order as an independent proposition at any time, because it is always in the power of the House to decide whether members shall attend its sittings or not; but the Chair thinks the motion is not in order as an amendment. The question is upon ordering the previous question upon the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, Will the House grant the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] leave of absence, as requested?

Mr. SPRINGER. For how long a time?

The SPEAKER. The request is for ten days.

The question was taken; and the motion of Mr. BUCHANAN to grant the leave of absence was agreed to.

Mr. STAHLNECKER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] requests leave of absence indefinitely.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the leave be granted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be considered as objecting to any leave of absence now. What I wanted to do was to raise the question, and having done that I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman does not mean to have it understood that the vote in the case of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] gives other members leave to go off without permission of the House? You do not mean to have it understood, of course, that the vote in the case of the gentleman from Ohio gives leave for other members to go away without authority.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I accept it so far as I am concerned——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House every request that may be presented.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I accept it, so far as I am concerned, as the judgment of the House that the action taken on Saturday last was improvident and is practically revoked.

Mr. WEAVER. I give notice that I do not so accept it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I objected yesterday to granting leave of absence to the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. HOVEY and Mr. MATSON], not from any desire to be discourteous, but because, after the action of the House on Saturday in revoking all leaves of absence, it looked to me like a farce to begin on Monday granting such leaves solely for political reasons. We ought to allow time at least for these gentlemen who have been absent to get here; we ought to make them think we are in earnest even if we are not.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this session on the first Monday of December, 1887, I have been absent from the House but twice, once to attend to the launching of the gunboat and another time on business in New York for my constituents. I am very anxious to get away. I am worn out and absolutely need rest. I do not wish any one to understand by my silence here that I shall decline or neglect to move or support a proposition that all leaves of absence be revoked in case certain measures should be presented to the House at this session which I think should command the attention of a quorum. As I have said, I am as anxious to get away as any one; but so long as I am compelled to stay here, I certainly feel that when a quorum of the House is necessary to pass business in which my constituents are interested I do not want to have my mouth sealed by any action which may be taken on leaves of absence to-day.

Mr. STRUBLE. Why is not this a good time to begin refusing leaves of absence except in cases of sickness?

Mr. SAYERS. I move the previous question on the motion to excuse my colleague.

Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] demands the previous question.

Mr. MASON (to Mr. GROSVENOR). You are absent by leave of the House. [Laughter.]

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof, the motion to excuse Mr. STEWART, of Texas, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, requests leave of absence for ten days, on account of urgent and important business.

Mr. CARLTON. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague, Mr. TURNER, has been called home on account of urgent and important business of a private nature connected with his family. As this House well knows, he has been steadily in his seat from the beginning of the session; and I hope the request will be granted. I move that it be granted, and call the previous question upon the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the result of the vote just taken—the ayes have it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My parliamentary inquiry has reference to this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Does it require the action of a quorum to grant these leaves of absence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would, except when the House is operating under a call.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I doubt whether we ought not to have at least a quorum present when these leaves are granted.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir; because I am unwilling that the House shall, so far as I am personally concerned, grant leaves of absence founded upon the private or public business of an individual when his absence will destroy a quorum. I shall, therefore, raise that question in granting leaves hereafter.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order that the gentleman is too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman was in time. The Chair had not announced the result of the vote when the gentleman from Indiana rose. The Chair supposed when the gentleman stated he rose to make a parliamentary inquiry that it had reference to some other proceeding, and therefore announced the result of the vote.

Mr. CRISP. But there has been no evidence of the lack of a quorum, or no record taken of the vote.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman had the right to demand a division.

Mr. CRISP. But he did not demand a division.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I did not care to demand a division unless there was something in the point; and I therefore desired to submit the parliamentary inquiry before making the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman would have the right, because he rose before the Chair announced the result of the vote.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; but he made no demand for a division.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair announced the result of the vote before the gentleman could have done so, although he had risen, as his parliamentary inquiry shows, for that purpose. The Chair supposed he rose for another purpose. The gentleman, however, was on the floor and addressing the Chair.

Mr. CRISP. But he never intimated that he wanted a division until it was too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not state that the gentleman demanded a division; but holds that he had the right to demand a division if he rose for that purpose.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I did not demand a division until I had ascertained the fact which my parliamentary inquiry elicited.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has held that the gentleman has the right, if he desires it, to demand a division. Does the gentleman demand a division?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to withdraw the request of my colleague.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will not withdraw it. I hope the House will grant the request. I object to the withdrawal. I think the leave of absence in this case should be granted by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I filed the leave of absence on behalf of my colleague for the reason I have already stated, that he had been suddenly called home to his family by reason of pressing private affairs which required his attendance. He requested me, however, if objection was made to the request for leave of absence, to withdraw the request; and I hope there will be no objection to the withdrawal.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I shall not object to the withdrawal under the circumstances, but I think the request for leave of absence should be unanimously granted. The gentleman from Georgia would not ask leave of absence unless it was a matter of grave importance, as he knows his public duties too well. He is a gentleman who never absents himself from the House, and who would not do so without sufficient reason.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the withdrawal. I think in this case leave of absence should be granted.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope, under the circumstances, the House will grant this leave.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana if he will not withdraw his objection.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is exceedingly difficult to refuse the appeals of gentlemen——

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that he need not feel any delicacy about the matter on account of my colleague. He is entirely willing that the request shall be withdrawn.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Because I have been absent myself so much and so often during this session that I regret to make any objection to such requests. But it strikes me that every day during this session we are confronted with the fact there is no quorum. I am entirely willing that this Congress shall dissolve now and let every gentleman go home——

Mr. MCMILLIN. So is the Senate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But it strikes me as an outrage upon the House to compel certain of its members to remain here day after day, but utterly unable to transact the public business by reason of the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion is not debatable except by unanimous consent——

Mr. DOCKERY. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered upon the motion.

Mr. CARLTON. I regret exceedingly——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects to debate.

Mr. CARLTON. I only wanted to withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made to the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. CARLTON. I do not wish to debate the question, but simply to ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. That has been made and objection entered.

Mr. CARLTON. Can I not renew the request?

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it not be in order to ask unanimous consent that the leave be granted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. That has been done and objected to. Thereupon the Chair laid the request before the House and motion was made that it be granted, upon which the previous question was ordered. The Chair submitted the question to a vote of the House, and the gentleman from Indiana demanded a division. That is the present situation.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. This being simply a personal request, pertaining to the gentleman from Georgia himself, what right has the House to object to its withdrawal?

The SPEAKER. Because the House has taken action upon it by ordering the previous question. It is not a request made by the gentleman from Georgia; it is a motion made by his colleague, and upon that motion the House has taken action by ordering the previous question. Of course under the rules of the House it can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, upon which the gentleman from Indiana has demanded a division.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the motion may be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. That request was made but the House has refused it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that the motion was to withdraw the request of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The personal request of the gentleman from Georgia is not before the House. It is the motion made by his colleague.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it would be in order to——

The SPEAKER. A personal request is only granted by unanimous consent. Then when that is refused it is in order to make a motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know who has objected.

The SPEAKER. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] objected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STEELE. I demand the regular order.

The question was then put, and the Speaker announced that the ayes were 100, noes 3.

Mr. CHEADLE (in his seat). No quorum.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman who makes the point of no quorum rise?

Mr. CHEADLE. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] as tellers.

Mr. CRISP. I would now renew the request——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia again asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion made by his colleague.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I object. I think he ought to be excused, but I object to the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. CRISP. It is apparent that there is no quorum.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRISP. There being evidently no quorum here, it is unkindness to Mr. TURNER to put him in the attitude of obstructing public business.

Mr. CHEADLE. I desire to withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the point of no quorum. The ayes have it, the motion is agreed to, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] is excused.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I request that my colleague [Mr. DE LANO] be excused. He is detained by sickness.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DE LANO] has had leave granted him.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will withdraw the demand for the regular order so that I may ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the demand for the regular order for that purpose.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11297) to suspend the laws touching the disposal of the public lands except the homestead law, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

THE JOSEPHINE AND M. C. UPPER.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, being Senate bill 2197, empowering and directing the Commissioner of Navigation to register and enroll as American vessels certain sailing vessels of foreign construction, repaired in the port of Cleveland, Ohio, and named the Josephine and M. C. Upper, respectively.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to cause to be enrolled and registered as American vessels the sailing vessels known as the M. C. Upper and Josephine, respectively, of foreign construction, but repaired in the port of Cleveland, Ohio, in accordance with the application for registration thereof now on file in the office of said Commissioner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYSON. This bill has passed the Senate unanimously and was reported unanimously by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It does not take a dollar out of the Treasury, but adds to the merchant marine of this country.

Mr. KELLEY. I object until I can learn something further about it. To what extent have there been repairs.

Mr. PAYSON. To something over seven-eighths of the total value.

Mr. KELLEY. Then that is within the statute, and I withdraw the objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAYSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

SUSAN B. HOPKINS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the Senate bill 1813 and that the same be considered now.

Mr. SPRINGER. In order that there may be one recognition on each side I withdraw the demand for the regular order so that this request may be made.

The SPEAKER. This is a bill which was laid aside a few mornings ago. The bill, which is a Senate bill, was not in the hands of the Clerk and it was passed over. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Susan B. Hopkins, widow of Arvah Hopkins, late of Tallahassee, Fla., deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Susan B. Hopkins, widow of Arvah Hopkins, late of Tallahassee, Fla., deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $392.50, in full for rent of houses used for offices and storing purposes situated in Tallahassee, Fla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will withdraw his demand long enough for me to send a resolution to the Chair, and ask that it be acted upon now? It would not take a minute.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, I can not; I demand the regular order.

TARIFF—ARE THE WOOL MANUFACTURERS IN FAVOR OF FREE WOOL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JACKSON Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the course of the debate on the tariff bill I had occasion to make a statement in reply to Mr. BUCKALEW respecting the manufacturers of wool in Pennsylvania, and especially in the city of Philadelphia——

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is making a general statement, and I ask that he state his question of privilege.

Mr. JACKSON. The statement I made was that the manufacturers of wool in Philadelphia and in Pennsylvania had no desire to have wool put on the free-list, and that they were opposed to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has not stated his question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] makes a point of order and insists upon the enforcement of the rule which requires that the gentleman shall state what his question of privilege is. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there can be no question of privilege before the House unless some motion is made or some resolution is offered on which the House can act. All other matters are merely matters of personal explanation, which can be entertained only by consent of the House.

Mr. JACKSON. I think that in one minute's time I can state what will be conceded to be a question of privilege.

Mr. BLAND. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that his colleague from Pennsylvania, to whom he alludes [Mr. BUCKALEW], is not present.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW], so far as I know, is giving no special attention to this matter. While my reply was originally made to his speech, I am only now referring to that incidentally. The question I wish to call attention to grows out of statements appearing in public newspapers, for which, I presume, he is not responsible, and which I conceive affects myself. I want to correct the newspaper statements.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will say that he desires to make a personal explanation, and will state how much time he requires, I shall have no objection.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Chair hear my statement?

The SPEAKER. If the enforcement of the rule is insisted upon, the Chair has no discretion in the matter. A "question" in the parliamentary sense means a proposition presented to the House to be disposed of, and unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania presents some proposition there can be, of course, no question of privilege. But if the gentleman desires to make a personal explanation, the Chair will ask the consent of the House that he be permitted to do so.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will say that he desires to make a personal explanation, and will state what time he requires, there will probably be no objection.

Mr. JACKSON. I expected to take even less time than I have already occupied. All I desire is to send to the desk and have read a statement which has appeared in the New York Herald and Philadelphia Record alleging that I misrepresented and slandered the wool manufacturers of Pennsylvania when I stated that they did not favor the Mills bill and were, in fact, opposed to free wool; and also to have read, as a reply to these newspaper articles, statements from a number of reputable gentlemen who are familiar with the facts of the case and who fairly represent those manufacturers, and who show that I stated their views truthfully and fairly. I should like to have at least a portion of these papers read, with permission to print the remainder.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will state that he desires to make a personal explanation——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does so state in substance.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. JACKSON. Not exceeding ten minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to ten minutes. If the gentleman will make his statement in five minutes I shall not object.

Mr. JACKSON. I shall be content with ten minutes' time and permission to print the remainder of this statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Several members objected.

Mr. JACKSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will make my statement of the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair has already decided, in accordance with the rules of the House and in accordance with repeated decisions heretofore, that no question of privilege is presented unless some motion or some resolution is offered.

Mr. JACKSON. Would it be in order to make a motion to have these papers read?

The SPEAKER. That would not present a question of privilege.

Mr. JACKSON. I presume I could print these papers under the general order made in relation to printing remarks on the tariff bill which would fully answer my purpose, but I did not wish to do that without giving in some way to the House public notice in advance of what I was doing. I therefore ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to print the extracts from the newspapers I have referred to and the replies thereto I have prepared in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, as an explanation of these papers in addition to what I have already said, I would call attention to these facts.

In the course of the tariff debate, my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW], on the 15th of May last, in his speech, which will be found on page 4986 of the RECORD, gave as a reason for his favoring the bill under consideration that it put wool on the free-list, to the great advantage of the wool manufacturers of the State. At the time I asked permission to call his attention to what I considered his mistaken representation of the interests of the wool manufacturers, but the gentleman declined to yield to me for even a question.

When the wool schedule was afterward under consideration by sections, on the 16th of July following, being the first opportunity I had, I made a reply to his statement, which will be found on page 6935 of the RECORD.

I then said, in substance, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] made a mistake in alleging that "free wool" was in the interest and for the advantage of wool manufacturers; that the wool manufacturers of Pennsylvania, largely situated in the city of Philadelphia, did not ask for free wool, but were uncompromisingly opposed to it; and that I was surprised my colleague should make such a mistake.

Mr. Speaker, at the time I made these remarks I felt confident that I knew the position of the manufacturers on this question, and that I truly and fairly represented them as a body in the statement I then made.

I was therefore surprised to find that the New York Herald and the Philadelphia Record, in noticing these proceedings in Congress, alleged that in stating that the wool manufacturers of Philadelphia were opposed to free wool I had misrepresented and slandered them. To correct these newspaper charges I have prepared some testimony supporting the truth of what I said and showing that the wool manufacturers of Philadelphia, and in fact the whole country, are almost, if not entirely, unanimously opposed to free wool and in favor of its protection. In justice to myself and in justice to these manufacturers I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks these papers.

The papers are as follows:

[From the New York Herald of July 17, 1888.]

FREE WOOL—DEMOCRATS REFUSE TO TAKE IT FROM THE LIST—ONLY A FEW "KICKERS"—MR. JACKSON'S STRANGE STATEMENT ABOUT PHILADELPHIA MANUFACTURERS—TARIFF DEBATES NEARLY OVER.

HERALD BUREAU,
CORNER FIFTEENTH AND G STREETS NORTHWEST,
Washington, July 16, 1888.

Free wool passed the House to-day by a handsome majority. To please the protectionists tellers were ordered, and the vote, on the motion of Mr. WILKINS to strike the free-wool clause out of the Mills bill, was defeated by 102 to 120.

The free-wool clause is to go into effect on the 1st of October, if the bill becomes a law, and the new wool duties in the Mills bill later, on the 1st of next January. That gives the woolen manufacturers a handsome start.

Before the vote was taken a queer and rather significant thing happened. Mr. JACKSON, of Pennsylvania, rose and "gave his testimony" that the woolen manufacturers of Philadelphia are "uncompromisingly hostile to free wool."

The queerness of this lies in the fact that Mr. JACKSON does not represent any district in or near Philadelphia, but a district in the center of the State, and that Philadelphia has in the House four Republican Representatives, all high protectionists—Messrs. BINGHAM, O'NEILL, KELLEY, and HARMER—not one of whom spoke up to-day.

The Herald, in its recent Philadelphia correspondence, has shown conclusively and repeatedly that a number of the leading woolen manufacturers there are in favor of free wool, and that a very large and increasing number of the workmen in the woolen mills demand free wool. Yet Mr. JACKSON, representing an interior district, assumes to speak for all these people and misrepresents their openly declared opinions.

Messrs. BINGHAM, O'NEILL, and HARMER, who are the Representatives of Philadelphia districts containing woolen mills, were too prudent to follow Mr. JACKSON'S exam[illegible]e.

[From the Philadelphia Record of July 18, 1888.]

PHILADELPHIA AND FREE WOOL.

In a report made to the Secretary of the Treasury in 1885 by the National Association of Wool Manufacturers appeared the following:

"The American manufacturer, to compete with the fabrics of other nations in the endless variety demanded by our times, must have the power of selecting a portion of his raw material from all the world's sources of supply. * * * The effect of the compulsion to buy greasy wool and pay a heavy specific duty on its impurities is that the American manufacturers are thereby obliged to give undue preference to light condition over fineness and the other valuable qualities of wools offering in foreign markets. Our manufacturers, moreover, are obliged by this restriction to concentrate their competition in foreign markets upon the always small proportion of the lightest unwashed wools, while our foreign competitors, having to pay duty neither upon wool nor on grease and dirt, can buy the heavy wools in the market to much better advantage.

"To these considerations it should be added that the high specific duty on clothing wools—a duty irrespective of the cost—practically excludes the cheap and abundant clothing wools of South America, and by freeing them from our competition for their purchase makes them much cheaper than they would otherwise be to the manufacturers of France, Belgium, and Germany, who work them up into cloths and stuffs by the cheapest labor in Europe."

This report was signed by Thomas Dolan and James Dobson, officers of the association. Is it possible that there are any woolen manufacturers in this city who fail to recognize the truth and the force of the above statement? Yet Mr. O. L. JACKSON, who represents a Congress district in the extreme western portion of Pennsylvania, arose in the House on Monday and declared that the woolen manufacturers of Philadelphia are "uncompromisingly hostile" to the policy of free wool advocated in this report. It is well known that Mr. JACKSON in his assertion slanders quite a number of leading Philadelphia manufacturers, who have declared emphatically in favor of free wool. But it would be strange if any number of them should oppose a change so manifestly favorable to their interests and to the general industrial interests of this city.

Mr. JACKSON. I would call attention to the fact that in the above quotation from the report of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, the concluding part of the report is omitted, which expressly states that the manufacturers favor extending protection to the wool-grower. It is as follows:

It will be observed that in this communication, which, we need not say, is addressed not only to you, but through you to Congress and the public, we have not urged, as has been customary with this association in former times, any argument for encouragement in behalf of the important industry most closely allied with our own, that of wool production. Circumstances, which we need not mention, seem to have made it expedient that each branch of the national wool industry should act independently in representing its interests as connected with tariff legislation.

As the domestic wool-grower, in view of the high cost of labor and the high scale of living required by American civilization, can not profitably send his wools abroad, and as every pound of foreign cloth imported, displacing a pound of American cloth which might be made here, at the same time displaces a quadruple weight of domestic wool, it might be claimed that the interests of our nearest allies are sufficiently served by securing defenses for the manufacturers which constitute their only market. This was the narrow and selfish argument for exclusive protection to manufacturers in former times.

A broader and more just policy now regards protection to any distinct interest but as a part of the universal system; and while we demand for our own finished products, and more imperatively still, for the labor by which they are wrought, the whole power of defense granted by the Constitution against other nations—defense against their policy, their pernicious trade, their extorted and pauper labor, no less than against their arms—we would extend the same defense to every home product, of the farm, the mine, and the forest, thus making our own identical with the national prosperity.

A FREE-WOOL CONTROVERSY—MR. JUSTICE CITES FACTS TO SUSTAIN CONGRESSMAN JACKSON—THE WOOLEN MANUFACTURERS OF PENNSYLVANIA, ALMOST WITHOUT EXCEPTION, HEARTILY OPPOSED TO THE INTRODUCTION OF FREE WOOL.

The friends of free wool having gone to the extremity of denying the facts on which Congressman JACKSON based his speech during the debate on the Mills bill, that gentleman has written the following letter, which was published in Saturday's Evening Telegraph:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C., July 24, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In the course of the recent tariff debate in the House I took occasian to state that the woolen manufacturers of Pennsylvania did not favor free wool. Among the authorities which I had read at the time to sustain this statement was an extract from the American, in which you were represented to take that position. I notice that the New York Herald and the Philadelphia Record criticise my statement, and say that I had no authority to represent the Philadelphia manufacturers.

"My remarks were made on the 16th of July, and reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the 17th, a copy of which I mailed you care of Board of Trade rooms. I would very much like, if you please, that you would write me, stating how far I was justified in saying what I did on the subject.

"Very truly yours,

"OSCAR L. JACKSON.

"Mr. THEODORE JUSTICE, Philadelphia, Pa."

MR. JUSTICE SUPPLIES FACTS.

In answer, Mr. Justice writes as follows:

"DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 24th received. There is the most ample proof, without the slightest doubt whatever, that the woolen manufacturers of the United States are almost without exception opposed to free wool. They have so declared through their associations and individually.

"Mr. William Whitman, the president of the National Woolen Manufacturers' Association, has declared through the press, on public platforms, and through the periodicals of his association, over and over again in public and in private, and before Congress, that the woolen manufacturers believe that free wool is not to the best interests of manufacturers nor skilled labor nor the people of the United States. He further states that he and the Manufacturers' Association believe in affording to the wool-grower, on principle, the same protection for his industry which the manufacturers demand for their industry. Mr. Whitman has very truly declared that he can count on the fingers of both hands, yes, on the fingers of one hand, all the prominent woolen manufacturers of New England in favor of free wool.

"The woolen manufacturers of the Middle States, and particularly of this locality, have been equally outspoken against free wool. Those who occupy this section belong to the Manufacturers' Club, of which Mr. Thomas Dolan is president. That gentleman has declared over and over again his belief that free wool will be a disadvantage to the manufacturing industry. Mr. Dolan expresses the almost unanimous opinion of the manufacturers of this locality, whose views coincide with those expressed by Mr. Whitman as the views of the manufacturers in the East.

"I inclose a copy of the official organ of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, namely, the Manufacturer, of April 1, 1888. This periodical is full of expressions of leading and prominent manufacturers, all of them the most representative of their class, on the subject of free wool.

"I refer to the opening speech by Mr. Dolan, on page 5; also to the very able address of Mr. Dolan's partner, Mr. Joseph P. Truitt, on page 9 of the same paper, entitled 'The proposition to make wool free,' in which Mr. Truitt says, 'Free raw material is the pioneer of free goods.' He further says that 'he believes that promises of relief based on free wool are a fraud and unreliable. It would not give the citizen a suit of clothes one dollar cheaper, and it would reduce his wages more than by any means he could hope to gain. It would result in free manufactured goods, for the farmer would never rest if you made wool free until he made goods free.' Mr. Truitt says he is 'in favor of protection from the lamb in the field to the clothes on our backs, and I desire now to render my emphatic disapproval of free wool.'

"I refer you also to the very able paper of Mr. Search, entitled 'The preparation of wool.' Mr. Theo. C. Search is one of the ablest young manufacturers and merchants in this locality; also a representative man. Mr. Search believes that if wool is made free, wool sorting and wool scouring will be done abroad. He thinks that wool combing will follow it, and that would cripple a large industry employing a large number of skilled laborers.

"I also refer you to the remarks of Mr. James Phillips, jr., of Massachusetts, one of the largest and most successful of New England manufacturers, whose success has been conspicuous at a time when worsted manufacturing has been generally languishing. In speaking of free wool he says, 'Anything which impairs the prosperity of the country is damaging to the interests of that country, and you can not injure a part without its effects being felt by other parts.' He says the wool product is one of the most important in the country, and it furnishes its producers the means for purchasing our manufactured articles, and were wool-growing destroyed it would deprive a large portion of the community of purchasing power, and the loss of this home market would depress the value of woolen products far in excess of any advantage that would be gained by giving the manufacturer his wool at a lower price.

"He further says that the immediate effect of free wool would be to depress its value; that as soon as this effect had caused the extermination of wool-growing in the United States the secondary effect would be a material advance in the price abroad growing out of the absence of competition of American wool-growers among other wool-producers of the world, and the increase of the American demand for foreign wool. The woolen manufacturers of this locality who differ from the majority are only a few proprietors of small establishments, and are not representative. It is a well-known fact that the wool-growing States of California, Oregon, Nevada, Wisconsin, Indiana, and New York have at times been Democratic; they are at present Republican, largely in the agricultural districts, where wool-growing is an important industry. These wool-growers are protectionists, but if their industry is destroyed they will wish to buy their clothing and other articles which they require in the cheapest markets in the world, and being no longer sharers in the benefits of protection, in consequence of the destruction of their flocks, it would be easy for them to fall back into the Democratic free-trade ranks with the solid free-trade South.

"Manufacturers of the Eastern and Middle States could not retain protective duties sufficient to cover the difference in wages, and the destruction to manufacturing would take place in these sections until the wages of skilled laborers fell to the starvation level of competing wages abroad.

"There are in the United States 2,287 woolen manufacturing establishments.

"I challenge the New York Herald or the Philadelphia Record to produce the signatures of the proprietors of ten important Pennsylvania woolen manufacturing establishments who favor free wool. The names of those parties over their own signatures are asked because the following petition for an increase of duties upon wool and woolens sufficient to cover the difference in wages between Europe and America has been signed very generally by the proprietors of these establishments within a few months.

"They demand not free wool, but enough higher duty upon wool and woolens to save their industries from destruction by the grinding competition of Europe.

"Yours, truly, "THEODORE JUSTICE."

"Hon. OSCAR L. JACKSON,
"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C."

THE PETITION.

The following is the petition referred to in the above letter:

"To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States:

"The undersigned citizens of the county of * * * and State of * * * respectfully petition your honorable body for speedy action on the subject of protection to the wool-growing and woolen-manufacturing industries of this country. They represent that the changes made by the act of Congress of March 3, 1883, reducing protection to these industries have already resulted in great injury to the sheep-growing interest, as well as to the manufacturing interests, and, that if continued, must result in the destruction, to a very great extent, of the wool-growing industry in all parts of our country, and also largely increase the price of mutton to the consumer. They represent that the number of sheep in the United States in 1883 was 49,237,291 (an increase of 15,453,691 since 1875), and which was reduced to 44,759,314 in 1887, showing a loss of 4,477,977 sheep in four years, whilst with proper protection the number, at the same ratio of increase, in 1887 would probably have been about 64,000,000. A further effect of this injurious legislation was an enormous increase in importation of foreign wool, both in unmanufactured and manufactured state, especially the latter, to the great loss of our domestic laboring classes, whether employed on farms or in workshops, and yielding an increase in revenue to the Government of about $4,000,000 per annum at a time when it was not needed.

"They therefore ask that the schedule of duties unanimously agreed upon by the representatives of the wool-growers and woolen manufacturers, at Washington, on January 14, 1888, may be enacted into a law at an early day, and, pending the passage of such bill, in accordance with the further action of said convention, we urgently request Congress to immediately pass a joint resolution correcting the present erroneous classification of worsteds, by directing that they be classified as woolen cloths.

THE WOOL QUESTION—A PROMINENT NEW YORK WOOLEN MANUFACTURER REPLIES TO THE GERMANTOWN DEMOCRAT.

Mr. E. H. Ammidown, of New York, who is a prominent woolen manufacturer and merchant, and who is also president of the American Protective Tariff League, and who was vice-president of the late wool conference held in Washington in January, has been reading the articles on the wool question in the Telegraph, and replies to the Germantown Democrat as follows:

"The view of the Germantown Democrat is very narrow. The benefits of the wool tariff are not limited to the wool-grower. Every farmer, including the whole seven million men engaged in farming, is benefited by the diversion of labor and capital into wool-growing. There is an overproduction not of some farm products. Even greater diversity would be advantageous. On this ground I favor protection on hemp, flax, and jute.

"The benefit accrues also to the whole population of the country in the proportion which the value of the wool clip contributes to the wealth and spendable income of the people. For if sheep husbandry was destroyed the income from it would cease and the farmers be deprived of their clip—their means of buying the products of other industries. It is well known among farmers that the cash received from the sale of their wool is relied on more than anything else to supply such of their needs as are not supplied from their farms. Thus the whole nation reaps the benefit from the tariff on wool the same as it does on every other important protected industry. It is part of a grand system for the elevation and advancement of the people, the benefits of which are not limited to any class or section. They extend to all. Strike down one part of the system and you weaken the whole, and if the destruction begins it will end in the overthrow of all our industries and in the organization of our labor and wages on the level of our foreign competition.

"EDWARD H. AMMIDOWN."

FIGURES ON FREE WOOL.

[From the Texas Live Stock Journal.]

Free wool means free goods; not a wool-grower from Maine to Texas would consent to pay an advanced price for goods if he was obliged to compete with the cheaper labor and cheaper lands of Russia, Asia, Africa, South America, and Australia. The wool-grower is a protectionist believing in the application of the principle to all industries.

Scoured wools can be bought in England at 28 to 32 cents per pound that compare with the Texas clip. With free trade these wools can be imported direct from the countries in which they are raised with no more expense than their present cost to English buyers.

To meet such cost, Western Texas wool would have to be sold to the consumer at 8½ cents per pound, choice eight-months wool at 10 cents, and twelve-months at 10½ cents. The minimum cost to the grower for the freight and expenses would not be less than 2½ cents per pound, and he would realize, for Western Texas, 6 cents; for choice eight-months, 7½ cents; for choice twelve-months, 8 cents.

The foreign values given can be substantiated by quotations from Bowes, of Liverpool; Windeler, Hammond, Schwartze, of London, and other leading brokers; any wool-grower can address either of them with sample of his wool and confirm the values given.

Free-trade papers claim that the duty on wool has nothing to do with its value, and quote prices prior to 1824 when wool was free, and later when the duty was very light, to prove their assertion, but they do not point to the changed condition.

Then there was not a single pound of wool raised in Australia, and only a small amount in South America; these are now the largest wool-growing countries of the world, and the reduction of prices which is due to them is much greater in England than here.

When wool was free or under a nominal duty quoted values were the same in England as in this country; to-day scoured Cape wool is worth only 32 cents in England, while similar Texas wool has sold this spring on a basis of 58 cents.

We give below value to-day to Texas wool-growers on a free-wool basis, prices at which wools were sold this spring, and in 1881 about the time agitation for reduction of duties commenced which culminated in 1883.

With the restoration of the tariff of 1867 every loom in the country would be started, and prices of wool would be fully equal to 1881. Our home market would be comparatively free from foreign goods and foreign wools.

If wool-growers would organize as the sugar, the whisky, and the tobacco rings have done, there would be no more cry of free wool, but a restoration of the tariff of 1867, and with it prosperity to the languishing industry of our State.

There is no cry for free wool from the weavers of woolen goods or the manufacturers of them, except in Rhode Island, and there it amounts to five out of thirty-nine woolen manufacturers who signed a petition for free wool, while every one except these five signed for the tariff of 1867.

EXPLANATION OF THE CAUSES FOR THE FLUCTUATIONS OF PRICES OF WOOL UNDER THE VARIOUS TARIFFS FROM 1825 TO 1887.

We give below a table showing the average price for Ohio fine wool from 1825 to 1887, the period covered by the several tariff acts. Prices for each period were not so much influenced by the duties imposed as by the ruling price in Europe, which largely determines the price in America. There has been, however, no free wool since the year 1816. Duties were increased in 1830, before the Australian and South American competition was important, and this was followed by an advance of over 5 cents per pound in the average price of American wool. From 1833 to 1842 the tariff was systematically reduced each year. When this reduction began the price of wool was 61 cents, and when it ended the price was 43¾ cents and the tendency of prices was generally downward, interrupted for brief periods by speculative excitement and by fluctuations in prices in London. There were no wide fluctuations in the average price from 1843 to 1861, and those which did occur are identical with similar movements in the markets of the world. It is a significant fact that the period between 1864 and 1867 was one in which the average price was the highest, and was also the period when the tariff and the premium upon gold—which was equivalent to an additional tariff—was also highest. Wool raised in Australia, South America, and the Cape of Good Hope amounted in 1860 to a total of over 65,000,000 pounds of scoured wool, but in 1868, when our tariff act of 1867 became operative, the wool product of these same countries was 195,000,000 pounds, an increase of 300 per cent in eight years. The depressing effect upon prices of wool by this enormous increase began to be apparent at that time, resulting in a downward tendency to prices in London and consequently in the United States. The increase in the amount of wools raised in foreign countries continued until in 1887 it had reached the enormous total of 370,000,000 pounds of scoured wool.

What was the effect upon prices of American wool when the tariff was reduced in 1883 and competing foreign wools were declining? Under the tariff of 1867 the average price of Ohio fine from 1876 to 1883 was over 42 cents. In the five years following the reduction made in 1883 the average price for the same wool was 33¾ cents, a decline of 8½ cents per pound; and with the same rate of increase in these foreign countries, where wool-growing has not yet reached its maximum, the probabilities are that during the coming years domestic wool may have to face the competition of a still lower range of prices in London, and therefore it is quite apparent that wool-growing in the United States would be doomed should there be any further reduction of duties, and that it is not only necessary to the preservation of the wool-growers' interests that the present rates of duties be maintained, but that he should have still more protection; but no amount of protection on his wool will help him unless the manufacturer who buys his wool has similar protection, paying as he does over 100 per cent. higher wages than is paid in Europe.

Table showing the average price for Ohio fine wool from 1825 to 1887, under the several tariff acts.

Periods.	Average price for XX Ohio wool under different tariff periods.	Duty.
1825	55	20 per cent. ad valorem.
1826	46¾	25 per cent. ad valorem.
1827	40½	30 per cent. ad valorem.
1828	45½	4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem.
1829	45½	4 cents per pound and 45 per cent. ad valorem.
1830 to 1832	60⅝	4 cents per pound and 50 per cent. ad valorem.
1833	61	4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem.
1834	64¾	4 cents per pound and 38 per cent. ad valorem.
1835	64	4 cents per pound and 36 per cent. ad valorem.
1836	68½	4 cents per pound and 34 per cent. ad valorem.
1837	60½	4 cents per pound and 32 per cent. ad valorem.
1838	50½	4 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem.
1839	57½	4 cents per pound and 28 per cent. ad valorem.
1840	47½	4 cents per pound and 26 per cent. ad valorem.
1841	50¾	4 cents per pound and 24 per cent. ad valorem.
1842	43¾	4 cents per pound and 22 per cent. ad valorem.
1843 to 1846	47½	3 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem.
1847 to 1857	47¾	30 per cent. ad valorem.
1858 to 1861	50½	24 per cent. ad valorem.
1862 to 1863	64¾	9 cents per pound.
1864 to 1867	74½	12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem.
1868 to 1872	54¾	10 and 12 cents per pound and 10 and 11 per cent. ad valorem.
1873 to 1875	55	10 and 12 cents per pound and 10 and 11 per cent. ad valorem, less 10 per cent.
1876 to 1883	42¾	10 and 12 cents per pound and 10 and 11 per cent. ad valorem.
1884 to 1887	34¾	10 and 12 cents per pound.

A PROTEST AGAINST PASSAGE OF THE MILLS BILL FROM THE MANUFACTURERS' CLUB OF PHILADELPHIA.

The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia on March 19, 1888:

"Resolved, That the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia desire to make protest against the adoption into a law of the tariff measure prepared by a majority of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and commonly known as the Mills tariff bill. The Manufacturers' Club further protest against the passage of the said bill even in an amended or modified form, believing it to be based upon wrong principles, to be essentially opposed to all safe precedents in American fiscal legislation, and from its intrinsic viciousness calculated to inflict serious injury upon both the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country."

Mr. Joseph P. Truitt said: "I am opposed to that provision of the Mills tariff bill which admits wool free of duty, for the reason that free wool would be of no lasting benefit to the American manufacturer. It is stated as one of the principal reasons why this policy should be adopted that the manufacturer would obtain his wool so much cheaper.

"If it is true that the abolition of wool duties would result in the cheapening of that article to the extent of the duty now paid, there is abundant reason for opposing it, for every pound of wool and every yard of goods now in the hands of dealers, merchants, and manufacturers would decline in value to a corresponding extent; and, as every sheep in the land must share in the depreciation, the immediate loss would be so great as to be almost incalculable. Every mill in the country would be compelled to stop; thousands of operatives now happily employed would be thrown upon the streets, and millions of yards of goods would be placed in the auction rooms for sale at prices that could only entail a fearful loss to the manufacturers; and while in this weakened condition the tide of foreign importation would come rushing in like some vast tidal wave, stifling and burying out of sight the industries of America, and years might elapse before they again recovered from the evil effects of this ill-advised measure.

"Free raw material is the pioneer of free goods, for we can not expect that the wool-grower will consent to a policy of protection which embraces everything he buys, and excludes every article which he produces and wants to sell.

"The success of woolen manufacturing in this country is founded upon sheep husbandry at home, and the wool-grower is just as much entitled to protection upon the wool in which he invests his capital and which he exerts his skill to produce as the manufacturer who asks for a tariff in order that he may put it into goods; and I conceive that it is not only fair and honest, but that the very success of our business depends upon the support we give to the wool-grower. To admit wool free of duty means nothing more or less than the destruction of sheep-raising for wool in America."

The secretary of the club, Mr. Charles Heber Clark, then spoke as follows:

"The pretext for this movement against American industry is that the people demand reduction of the duties upon imported fabrics. This assertion was made by the President in his recent message, and it has had frequent repetition in Congress and in the press. We now formally deny that such a demand is or has been made, and we challenge those who are conducting and encouraging the movement to produce any evidence in support of their theory. No such evidence is in existence, and in its absence we confidently express the opinion that the American people do not desire reduction of the duties upon imports, but, on the contrary, are averse to any change which is not in the nature of an advance of the duties. There is an old motto which says, 'When you stand well, stand still,' and it applies exactly to the present situation.

"It is true that the free-trade newspapers are insisting upon decrease of the duties; but these journals are a small minority of the newspapers of the country. They circulate chiefly among the illiterate classes (performing the function of feeding ignorance with mendacity), and they appear to represent the sentiments of a small minority of the people. The fact that they accurately voice the desires of the whole body of European manufacturers and have the cordial approval of the entire British newspaper press (which, with characteristic effrontery, is attempting to meddle with the domestic affairs of this nation) is a circumstance that can hardly add force to their clamorous demands. It is a fair inference that an American journal which obtains from our industrial enemies in Europe the principal expressions of approval of its course does not accurately represent American sentiment."

A STAB AT THE NATION'S INDUSTRIES—A DEMONSTRATION OF THE HARM THE MILLS BILL WILL DO TO AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

Mr. James Phillips, the well-known woolen manufacturer, of Fitchburg, Mass., is reported at length in the Boston Herald upon the Mills tariff bill. We reproduce here some portions of his striking arguments:

"The wool and woolen industries of the United States are practically facing to-day a proposition from a majority of the House of Representatives for free wool and an ad valorem duty on woolen goods and clothing. This in the face of the fact that a joint conference fairly representative of both industries has decided that both the wool-growing and woolen manufacturing industries are now suffering from over importation, and there can be no doubt that the reduction in both the wool and woolen schedules, made in 1883 by men not friendly to American industries, have resulted disastrously and increased importations on six articles in five years over $11,000,000.

"The effect of these changes, urged by tariff reformers, and reluctantly yielded by those who perhaps should have had more faith in protection, has not been sufficiently encouraging either to American industries or American labor to warrant us in going still further on the road of so-called 'tariff reform.' Indeed, the reverse has happened. The very men who under pressure in 1883 consented to reductions have now in a clear voice cried 'halt,' and decided that the interests of both industries demand that we retrace our footsteps by reenacting the wool tariff of 1867 with certain modifications made necessary by the progress of woolen manufacturing during the last twenty years. Nor is it possible, in the light of the result which followed the changes of 1883 to view with anything short of alarm the radical changes proposed by Mr. ROGER Q. MILLS and his colleagues of the Ways and Means Committee, aided by the great influence of the President of the United States, and an Administration powerfully impregnated with the doctrine of free trade. For more than sixty years wool has been dutiable, and though some changes in the rates and classification have been made, with various results, during this period, the propositions of President Cleveland and Chairman MILLS for unqualified free trade in wool has, for the first time in the history of the Republic, been squarely presented and advocated as an issue for the people to decide. The importance of this step, with all its attendant consequences, must not be underestimated.

"We are asked to abandon a system which has stood by us fairly well for nearly sixty-five years; a system under which our flocks have increased, our breeds of sheep improved, our fleeces become better in quality, increased in weight, and the food of the people cheapened; a system under which the United States has developed a manufacturing industry, the value of the annual product of which is not far short of $300,000,000. These are all stubborn facts to face. They go a long way with practical business men and with intelligent workingmen. They can not be refuted by theories and conjectures of what might have happened under some other system, and what will happen if one of these two inter-dependent industries is taken from the dutiable schedule and suddenly plunged into that 'haven of free-trade delight, the free-list.' This, it would seem to me, is a fair statement of the vital issue which wool-growers and woolen manufacturers are called upon by the present Government to face. Free wool. That is the key-note of President Cleveland's message, and that is the basis of the Ways and Means Committee's tariff bill. To impress the idea of free wool upon the people of the United States, the President was willing to banish all other questions from his message. To emphasize the idea of free wool Mr. MILLS was willing to leave coal and iron ore for the moment on the dutiable list and reduce pig-iron slightly. The issue, therefore, is unmistakably made on free wool, and that must be considered first.

"It has been clearly demonstrated by those who have studied the subject historically and statistically in all its details, that without protection the wool-growing industry of the United States will be destroyed; that under normal conditions a sufficiently high protective tariff will make that industry remunerative and prosperous; and that when under a protective tariff the prices of wool have been so low as to make wool growing unremunerative, it has resulted not from the tariff but from abnormal conditions, and but for the tariff the decline of the industry would have been much greater. It is hardly possible to present the facts which point unmistakably to these conclusions in the present discussion, but in a general way it may be stated that precisely the same reason which makes it impossible for the woolen manufacturer in the United States to compete with woolen manufacturers in foreign countries—namely, the difference in cost of labor—enters into the problem of wool growing. In other words, the cost of labor engaged in wool growing in South America, in Australia, in Russia and in other countries is much less than in the United States. Then the cost of pasturage in those countries is less than in our own, to say nothing of climatic differences which make it necessary for us to feed and care for our sheep during the cold winter months. All these facts have been brought out in an unmistakable way by the wool-growers of the country.

"They have made as good a case in favor of protection as can possibly be made by any other industry. There can be no doubt of this. If this is admitted, and even free-traders must admit it, then I claim that it is impossible for any man who considers himself a protectionist, let alone any manufacturer who asks for protection for his goods, to discount his own argument by denying the statistical evidence presented by the wool-growers of the United States. The history of the development of wool growing in the United States is the same as that of any other protected industry. Its growth began when a tariff was enacted that enabled the American producer to compete with his foreign rival; that encouraged him to go ahead and improve the breed and quality of his sheep and increase the weight of its fleece. Like the other industries, the wool industry reduced when the protective barrier was lowered, and increased and developed rapidly when the tariff of 1867 secured for the American wool-grower the American market; until, in 1883, our flocks, stimulated by the tariff, reached over 50,000,000 sheep, and the product of the wool in pounds was 308,000,000.

"Then came the fatal reduction in 1883, together with the importation abuses in the form of 'ring waste' and 'noils,' and from that time to the present the number of sheep has declined, the wool product has decreased, and our native product has been supplanted by the foreign. These are simple facts which must be faced, and the point I wish to emphasize is, that these facts can not be construed one way for wool-growers and another way for wool-manufacturers. As we now stand our annual consumption of foreign wool aggregates about 100,000,000 pounds. Of this, however, probably 80,000,000 pounds are carpet wools, largely of a kind not raised here. Our own product, which under adequate protection should be about 300,000,000 pounds, with about 20,000,000 pounds of imported wool of similar quality, supplies what we need at the present time for home manufactures of clothing and for other purposes. Practically, therefore, our home supply of wool is nearly equal to the home demand for clothing purposes, and with adequate protection will undoubtedly continue to be so, and soon fully supply this demand. The value of the wool product is about $100,000,000 per annum, depending on the market prices.

Wool is the sixth in order of value among the agricultural products, being exceeded only by corn, hay, wheat, cotton, and oats. Only one country in the world, Australia, excels us in the quantity of wool produced. We who live in manufacturing States, which only produce 1,250,000 sheep, are apt to underestimate the importance and the ramifications of this great industry throughout the agricultural regions of the country. One hundred millions annually. What does that mean to the farmers of the United States? Well, suppose that by the passage of this free-trade bill this industry is seriously injured or destroyed, what will be the consequence to the farmer? Anything which impairs the prosperity of a country is damaging to the interests of that country, and you can not injure a part of a country without the effects being felt in other parts any more than you can develop and make prosperous a part of a country without that development and prosperity benefiting the country as a whole. The wool product, as I have shown, is one of the most important, and it furnishes to its producers the means for purchasing our manufactured articles.

PROTECTION TO HOME INDUSTRIES—A GREAT NEW ENGLAND PROTEST AGAINST THE MILLS TARIFF BILL.

FEBRUARY, 1888.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Fiftieth Congress assembled:

The undersigned, manufacturers in New England, recognizing the principle of protection as national and not provincial, and consequently equally applicable to all the industries of the United States; repudiating any distinction in this connection between so-called "raw materials" of domestic production and "finished products," whether the output of mines, farms, or workshops; claiming that the American policy should benefit alike all citizens, whether engaged in agriculture, manufacturing, or mining; that the industries of the country are interdependent and mutually sustaining, and the people of the different sections co-customers and co-consumers:

Do therefore respectfully submit that no article, "raw" or otherwise, of home production should be added to the free-list or inequitably changed in the tariff rates.

The undersigned also submit that for a due understanding of the premises, the following official records of the Government should be kept in mind, to wit:

Free imports: Increase in twenty years, 1868 to 1887, from $29,000,000 to $233,000,000, or 700 per cent.

Dutiable imports: For same period, increase from $329,000,000 to $450,000,000, or 37 per cent.

Custom duties: For same period, increase from $164,000,000 to $214,000,000, or 30 per cent.

Also, that the expenditures of the Government, including sinking fund, for the last fiscal year, were about $10,000,000 in excess of the customs receipts.

Believing that the existing tariff policy, both free and dutiable, is working in harmony with the industrial and productive interests of all sections of the country, the undersigned deprecate any departure from this policy, whether directed against "raw" or "finished" American products.

(Signed by 320 New England manufacturers.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

D. W. PRICE.

Mr. TAULBEE, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2382) for the relief of D. W. Price; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. H. VAUGHAN.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4767) for the relief of W. H. Vaughan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. B. CARTER.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 11248) for the relief of E. B. Carter; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN GRAY.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 11165) or the relief of John Gray; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. YOUNG.

Mr. CROUSE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 4602) for the relief of William H. Young; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The call of committees having been concluded—

The SPEAKER. The regular order is now the hour for the consideration of bills heretofore reported from committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with that hour.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I object.

The SPEAKER. The hour begins at five minutes after 1 o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STRUBLE. As the chairman of the Committee on Pensions is absent, I ask that this committee be passed this morning without losing its place.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri (when the Committee on War Claims was called), said: I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on War Claims be passed this morning without losing its place.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LANHAM (when the Committee on Claims was called). Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SHAW], who is now absent, has in charge a bill concerning the State of Maryland which he has been authorized to call up during this hour. I ask unanimous consent that the committee be passed over informally, not to lose its place.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. McCREARY (when the Committee on Private Land Claims was called). I ask unanimous consent that this committee be passed over informally to-day, not losing its place.

Mr. HERBERT. I must object. I desire very much to have the Committee on Naval Affairs reached.

Mr. McCREARY. This does not prevent that committee being reached.

A MEMBER. It will be reached so much the sooner.

Mr. HERBERT. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection, the order requested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LANHAM (when the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was called). I ask unanimous consent that this committee be passed over informally, without losing its place. The chairman is absent on official business, and there is a measure which that committee has authorized to be called up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be passed over informally, without losing its place in the call.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

PRINTING OF GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

Mr. WHEELER (when the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department was called). I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILKINS. I object.

Mr. WHEELER. I move, then, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER (having put the question) said: The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. WILKINS. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 7.

Mr. WILKINS. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILKINS and Mr. WHEELER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 112, noes 2.

The SPEAKER. Is the point of no quorum insisted upon?

Mr. WILKINS. I insist upon it.

The tellers continued the count.

Mr. WHEELER (during the count). I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the hour to which the committee is entitled may be occupied to-morrow.

Mr. WILKINS. I object.

The tellers continued the count.

Mr. DOCKERY (during the count). I renew the request that the remainder of the hour to which this committee is entitled be taken to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the request of the gentleman.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is that the remainder of the hour—whatever number of minutes may remain—be occupied by this committee to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean that the hour now running shall cease entirely for to-day, or that the Chair shall proceed to call another committee?

Mr. DOCKERY. My intention is that the hour be terminated for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees be considered as terminated for to-day, and that the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department have the same time to-morrow that they would have to-day.

Mr. WILKINS. Then if this measure should not be concluded to-morrow, would the committee have another hour on the next day?

The SPEAKER. They would, on the next day or whenever there may again be a consideration-hour.

Mr. WILKINS. Then I object.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I ask unanimous consent to withdraw this bill and call up another.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw his motion. The gentleman, as the Chair understands, withdraws his motion that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHEELER. If I now present another bill, will it have the same rights as if it had been called up originally?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if another bill should be taken up and should not be disposed of before the expiration of this hour, the committee would have another hour if necessary to complete the consideration of that bill, but not to call up any other bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I ask for the yeas and nays on the bill.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is the way to do it.

Mr. WILKINS. It is too late.

Mr. WHEELER. I can renew the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider bills reported from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. What bill?

Mr. WHEELER. The bill the title of which has been read, a bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art.

On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 167, nays 3, not voting 154; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, said: I ask leave to vote. I was in the restaurant taking a lunch when the roll was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no right under the rules even to entertain this request if the gentleman was not within the Hall when his name was called.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I will say, then, that I would have voted in the affirmative if I had been here.

The following were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. PEEL with Mr. KETCHAM.
Mr. BRYCE with Mr. ATKINSON.
Mr. LANDES with Mr. MORRILL.
Mr. SIMMONS with Mr. ARNOLD.

For this day:
Mr. MCADOO with Mr. COOPER.
Mr. GLOVER with Mr. PUGSLEY.
Mr. BERRY with Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR.
Mr. COX with Mr. BREWER.

Mr. PERRY. I notice that I am paired, and therefore will withdraw my vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. If I had been present I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. WILKINS. For fear my vote may be misunderstood I will change my vote from the negative to the affirmative. I do this for fear my objection to this bill may be misconstrued.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to change his vote.

Mr. WILKINS. I desire to have my vote recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I notice again, Mr. Speaker, that I am paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]; but if he were here, as he would vote the same way as I do, I will leave my vote stand in the affirmative.

Mr. BYNUM. I withdraw my vote, Mr. Speaker, being paired with my colleague [Mr. OWEN]; but I wish the RECORD to show that if I had voted I should have voted "ay" on this proposition.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. MCCREARY in the chair.

PRINTING OF GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The bill should certainly be read; we want to know what we are voting upon.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I would like to hear it read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act all Government securities, bonds, notes, checks, stamps, and drafts shall be printed in the highest style of the art of plate-printing from hand-roller presses.

SEC. 2. That hereafter the Chief and Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing shall be either practical engravers or plate-printers.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

Strike out, in line 4, the word "checks" and, in line 5, the words "and drafts;" and insert, before the word "stamps," in line 4, the words "and internal-revenue;" so that it will read, "bonds, notes, and internal-revenue stamps shall be printed," etc.

Mr. WHEELER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN].

Mr. WILKINS. Is there not a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. WHEELER. There is quite a lengthy report.

Mr. WILKINS. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman can have the report read in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the report is in the nature of debate; and when the gentleman from Ohio gets the floor he will have, of course, the privilege of having the report read in his own time.

Mr. HEARD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, in charge of the bill, if he will either have the report read, or make some explanation with regard to the bill?

Mr. WHEELER. I will state that the report is quite lengthy, and that it has been in the hands of the members of the House for several weeks. I can not have it read now, for the reading of it would occupy all the time during the hour, and destroy the only chance of action on the bill.

Mr. HEARD. I do not ask for the reading of the report; but I trust the gentleman will give us an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Ohio, to whom I have yielded five minutes will, no doubt, explain it satisfactorily to the gentleman.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes allotted to me by the gentleman from Alabama I will not attempt to enter into a full explanation of all that is contemplated by this bill, but will address myself only and ask the attention of the committee only to a few of the salient features embodied in it.

I introduced the bill, which was referred by the House to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, was considered by that committee, and unanimously reported to the House. Before introducing this measure I was fully satisfied, by careful examination of all the facts bearing upon the question, that it was a measure that should commend itself to the judgment and wisdom of the House. The necessity for its passage will become apparent upon even casual investigation.

It is not a bill, as some gentlemen may perhaps think, that relates entirely to the question of labor employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It is a matter of greater importance and more far reaching in its effects perhaps than that. It concerns the people of the whole country. It is a matter in which the people of the United States are necessarily interested, and is of consequence to every man, woman, or child who holds any of the securities or moneys of the United States.

Originally all the securities and paper money of the United States were printed by hand-presses, but the present Mugwump Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has introduced machines to do this work. I may state here that it is claimed, and personally I believe it to be true, that the machines introduced by Mr. Graves were discarded by the American Bank Note Company, of New York, as being entirely useless for its business in connection with the printing of bank notes, stamps, checks, etc. Not only is the character of the work far inferior to that done by hand-presses, but the Government is paying a royalty of $1 on each thousand impressions made by these presses, which goes into the pockets of the inventor of these worthless machines; and I believe there is also a payment of from $500 to $1,000 for the use of each of these printing-machines.

But the great objection to the use of the presses is the manifest inferiority of the work turned out by them. I believe there is not a gentleman upon the floor who is not cognizant of the fact that any of the silver certificates of the denomination of $1 and $2 which he carries in his pocket, after three or four weeks' use, becomes so ragged and generally mutilated in appearance as to be unsuited for use as a circulating medium. Many of the old greenbacks or Treasury notes that were printed in this bureau by hand have been in existence and have been circulated from hand to hand for twenty-odd years, and yet they are to-day perfect specimens of work, comparatively new in appearance, as compared with these new notes, which have been in circulation for only three or four months.

The committee who had this bill in charge had before them quite a number of these mutilated, ragged, and badly-printed notes, and it is not necessary to enter into any lengthy discussion upon that point; nor in fact is it necessary to state at length why this bill should pass. It is enough to say that no steel engraving can be satisfactorily printed by machinery. There is not a steel engraving in the parlor of any gentleman here, either in frames, books, or works of art, which was printed by machinery, because it is perhaps as utterly impossible to make a perfect impression of a steel engraving by machinery as it would be to make an oil painting by machinery. There are some things that machinery can not do, and one of these is to make as clean cut an impression of a steel engraving as can be done by the hand of a skilled workman. This is a fact well known, and the inequality of the work of these new notes has been a matter of daily comment ever since these old machines were introduced into the bureau.

Besides that, the number of counterfeits of silver certificates is alarmingly on the increase; and it is no wonder, because on any of these new notes, turned out by a steam-press, where the fiber of the material is destroyed by the heavy pressure, where the machine itself is unable to wipe or properly prepare the plate before each impression, or to distribute the ink as evenly as can be done by hand, the quality of the work is so inferior that the work of the counterfeiter is rendered far more easy; and I say it is no wonder, because the notes now in circulation, especially the silver certificates that have been out but a very short time, have such a defaced and generally poor appearance that an expert penman with a steel pen and the proper quality of ink can make almost an equally good imitation in a very short time. I have seen in the room of the chief of the Treasury detectives, the Secret Service Bureau, any number of notes which have been counterfeited in this way. The only reason assigned for the use of these machines is economy. It is admitted by the chief that the work is inferior to hand-work, but the chief is in favor of cheap work. This is not a question of labor; it is not a question of economy for the Government, but economy for the people. The people demand a currency equal in artistic merit to that of other nations; above all, they want a currency so well executed and printed that amateurs at least can not counterfeit it.

Mr. WHEELER. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR].

Mr. FARQUHAR. The question presents itself in this bill whether, under the present arrangement of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, we shall continue our present system of press-work. It is generally conceded that our engravers are as skilled workmen as can be found in the country. That is just as universally conceded as that the currency of the United States as printed by these steam-presses is about the poorest in the world.

Now, sir, it is only ten years ago since these presses were put in the Government office. They were put in there and covered by a royalty of $1 per one thousand impressions. That royalty up to this time has cost the Government probably between $50,000 and $60,000. There has been, according to the figures of the chief of that bureau, some little saving in one way; that is, the steam-presses are more rapid, and turn out more work, and it is testimony that in the total of the expenses made they are one-sixth or one-eighth during the whole year.

Now, sir, I take it that as the Government prints all its own notes, and as this House has full jurisdiction over this matter, it is the duty of this body to institute such reforms in this office by returning to the old and only system of printing that can turn out perfect work, and thereby, while it increases the cost there, we will save the cost that is attached to dozens of men in the secret service who daily and weekly travel over this country hunting down counterfeiters. So while it may be a saving to have these steam-presses turning out more work, it is a positive loss to the Treasury Department.

Now I want to say further that it is not a question as to who will be hired in this Government office. It is not a question of victory for the plate-printers of America; it is not a victory over Mr. Graves; it is simply a question whether the common sense of Congress shall bring this office back to the same practical mechanical condition that we find in the private establishments in the United States. It is whether this Congress shall, instead of having the work done there, take second place with private establishments, or shall maintain the standard of work and save the ignorant people who take these bad bills from loss.

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BURNES. At the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] I feel constrained to yield my time to him.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I was one of a special committee appointed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate this question of printing our securities, and during that investigation, which I made special and very thorough, I was not only satisfied myself that the printing done by the steam-presses was inferior printing, but all the testimony taken, not only of those who were brought in as witnesses and printers, but Mr. Morgan and a number of other witnesses all agreed that the highest style of the art can not be reached with steam-presses. There was some difference of opinion, however, as to whether the steam-presses were so imperfect as to warrant throwing them out at the present.

There was no witness who did not agree in their explanation as to why the steam-press would not do as fine work as the hand-press; namely, they had no eyes, they had no brains, they could not think, and therefore in wiping the plate and especially in the vignettes that were made by hand engraving they could not be manipulated by the steam-wiper, because it worked universally over the whole plate. There was no witness that did not agree that fine vignette work and hand engraving could not be done so well on the steam-press; but they agreed that machine engraving could be printed on the steam-press as well as on the hand-press. That is the reason why the backs of our securities are invariably printed on the machine-presses, while the face is always printed on the hand-press, and the point of this argument is made conclusive, because on the face of the bills, or on the majority of them, there is vignette work or work done by hand-engravers.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WILKINS. I desire to be heard on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that there are amendments pending.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee amendments be adopted.

Mr. WILKINS. Mr. Chairman, if this bill is reported back to the House, will not time be accorded to gentlemen who desire to be heard on the subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of this bill expires at five minutes after 2 o'clock.

Mr. WILKINS. Do I understand the Chair to say that we shall have an hour to-morrow, even if the previous question should be ordered to-day?

The CHAIRMAN. If the previous question is ordered and the consideration hour expires, then to-morrow the previous question will still be in force.

Mr. WILKINS. Then there will be thirty minutes for debate after the previous question is ordered?

The CHAIRMAN. There will be an hour to-morrow.

Mr. HEARD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEARD. Whether the previous question be ordered now or not, will we not have an hour to-morrow?

The CHAIRMAN. There will be an hour to-morrow.

Mr. HEARD. Very good. Then I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], who appears to be in charge of this bill, why it would not be better to have the discussion before the committee takes action on reporting the bill to the House? It may be that this committee may not desire to recommend the passage of the bill. I do not know that I shall antagonize it, but I desire some additional information about this bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for the question.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman will have to wait a little before he gets it. He has no right to take me off the floor. I have a right to ask this question and to ask it in my own way, provided I do not violate the rules of the House in the manner of my doing so. Now, I want the gentleman, or somebody else who is authorized to speak for the committee recommending the bill, to explain the reasons for the second section thereof. If the gentleman will explain why we should pursue the course which he proposes——

Mr. FARQUHAR. You have done well. You have killed the bill for to-day.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to kill this bill, and I do not propose that the gentleman from New York shall put that construction on my action. I rose to ask a question for information.

Mr. WILKINS. Information which you have not got yet from anybody.

Mr. HEARD. Information which we have not got yet. I simply desire to have these gentlemen explain the provisions of the bill, so that we may understand the necessity of its passage before we are asked to recommend it to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The first hour for the consideration of the bill has expired. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will please take the chair.

Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCCREARY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, my object being to proceed to the consideration of House bill 10614, to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. SPRINGER; and there were—ayes 54, noes 16.

Mr. BARNES. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 45 members voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142; nays 16; not voting 166; as follows:

Mr. RYAN (after the roll-call had been concluded). Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. RYAN. No, sir. I ask unanimous consent to have my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair under the rules can not entertain that request unless the gentleman was in the Hall when his name was called.

Mr. RYAN. If permitted to vote, I should vote "ay."

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DUNN with Mr. LONG, for the rest of the day.

Mr. COX with Mr. BAKER, of New York, until further notice, except on the Oklahoma bill.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 142, the nays 16. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. As only three or four members in addition to those who have voted are required to make a quorum, I ask unanimous consent that the names of those who have not responded be again called.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move, then, that there be a call of the House

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following-named members failed to answer:

The names of the foregoing absentees were called for the presentation of excuses.

The following-named members were absent on leave:

Mr. Biggs, Mr. Blanchard, Mr. Candler, Mr. Cox, Mr. Cogswell, Mr. Cutcheon, Mr. Cooper, Mr. De Lano, Mr. Finley, Mr. Granger, Mr. Gaines, Mr. Grosvenor, Mr. Hemphill, Mr. Houk, Mr. Johnston of North Carolina, Mr. Jones of Alabama, Mr. McShane, Mr. McRae, Mr. Owen, Mr. Pidcock, Mr. Randall, Mr. Rayner, Mr. Rice, Mr. Simmons, Mr. Stephenson, Mr. Scott, Mr. Sherman, Mr. Stewart of Texas, Mr. Stahlnecker, Mr. Sowden, Mr. Thomas of Kentucky, Mr. Turner of Georgia, Mr. Wilber.

For the remaining members who failed to answer to their names, no excuses were offered except in the following cases:

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Indiana, Mr. JOHNSTON, be excused on account of sickness. He went home sick about an hour ago.

There being no objection, Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, was excused.

Mr. WILKINSON. I have received a telegram from my colleague, Mr. ROBERTSON, stating that he expects to be here to-morrow morning. He has been absent on leave. I ask that he be excused. I ask also that my colleagues, Mr. BLANCHARD and Mr. GAY, who are both sick, be excused.

The SPEAKER. As to the two gentlemen last named the Chair understands they have already been excused. The gentleman asks that his colleague, Mr. ROBERTSON, who, he states, will be present to-morrow morning, be excused for to-day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PETERS. My colleague, Mr. MORRILL, was here on Saturday, but at that time felt very unwell. I do not know that he is sick; but I ask that he be excused, because he is not here; and, as is generally known to members, he is here when well.

There being no objection, Mr. MORRILL was excused.

The call of absentees for the presentation of excuses being concluded—

The SPEAKER. The officers of the House will now close the doors.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to inquire whether there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. On this call 184 members have responded to their names.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The officers of the House will reopen the doors.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In conformity with the request of the Senate, I ask that conferees be appointed on the part of the House upon all the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill. Some confusion has arisen in the Senate as to the purpose of the House in non-concurring in a portion of the amendments. In order that there may be no further confusion I ask that the request of the Senate be granted and that conferees be appointed upon all the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the House agree to the request of the Senate for a further conference on all the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. How would that change the present status of the matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state what has been done by the House. The House disagreed to the report of the committee of conference (which, of course, was an entirety), thereby leaving all the amendments open for further conference; but immediately afterward the House, upon motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], insisted upon its disagreement to certain amendments, four in number, and asked a further conference upon those amendments alone, leaving the other thirty-one amendments without action.

Mr. ROGERS. And the conference ought to be on all disagreeing votes?

The SPEAKER. On all disagreeing votes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to avoid confusion it would be best to disagree to all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. SPRINGER. The usual course is to have a conference upon all disagreeing votes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moves that the House insist upon its disagreement to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the further conference requested by the Senate. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. TOWNSHEND, Mr. SAYERS, and Mr. RYAN as conferees on the part of the House.

OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. On this question the yeas and nays were ordered and taken; but no quorum voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope unanimous consent will be given to go into committee by vacating the call, as a quorum has appeared. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed with the call of the roll.

CORRECTION.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to correct the RECORD of this morning so as to show in the few remarks I made yesterday and a few made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], that were pretty closely interwoven—to show the remarks as they were given by the Reporters' notes; and I will ask to have them read, or rather to have them inserted in the RECORD, by unanimous consent, so as to save the time of the House, in order that that debate may appear exactly as it took place as shown by the Reporters' notes, and then I will point out what I specially complain of. If there is no objection, I will not take the time to have the Reporters' notes read, but insert them.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is the gentleman from Indiana present?

Several MEMBERS. He is.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time will my colleague take?

Mr. CANNON. It will not take long.

Mr. SPRINGER. How long?

Mr. CANNON. I can not tell, but I will only take the time necessary to state the correction.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not wish the gentleman to go into a lengthy debate.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose we have the right to correct the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The practice of the House has been to treat these requests for correction of the RECORD as matters of privilege, although technically they are not under the rule. The RECORD purports to be and is required by law to show the correct report of the proceedings and debates; it is the official paper, and when a mistake occurs or an error is committed the Chair thinks it is proper the House should have the power at all times to correct it.

Mr. CANNON. It is understood, Mr. Speaker, without taking up the time of the House to read the original notes, that they shall go into the RECORD.

The colloquy between Mr. CANNON and Mr. BYNUM as reported by the Official Reporters is as follows:

Mr. CANNON. I will take the floor for a few moments, and I do it for the purpose of calling attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], made in the House on the 20th instant and telegraphed through the country, and inserted in the RECORD of the 26th. He says in his remarks:

"The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] rushes to the defense of his brother Benjamin, and it is highly proper that he should do so. There is an appropriateness in their companionship. It is a trite but true saying 'that birds of a feather flock together.' The gentleman from Illinois is a worthy champion of the record of General Harrison, his own record being akin to that of his candidate for the Presidency. I am of the opinion, however, that it will keep the gentleman busy this campaign to take care of his own record.

"In the Forty-sixth Congress Mr. Goode, a Democrat of Virginia, on April 21, 1879, offered a joint resolution (H. Res. 9) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law. On the 7th of May a member of the Committee on Education and Labor reported the resolution to the House with a favorable recommendation.

"The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] opposed the passage of the resolution. In reply to a question whether the last proclamation of President Grant did not declare that there should be no reduction in the wages of workmen employed by the Government of the United States on account of a reduction of the hours of labor he said:

"'I do not now recollect, but it is not material; the fact is, the law as now executed is this: if they work ten hours they get ten hours' pay, and if they only work eight hours they only get eight hours' pay. In other words, they only get pay for what they earn. That is, the law is now being executed, and, so ar as I am concerned, it will go on in that way, proclamation or no proclamation.'

"On motion of Mr. CANNON, the resolution was laid on the table—yeas 127, noes 90. Among those voting with the gentleman from Illinois are the following distinguished Republicans: BAYNE of Pennsylvania, BURROWS of Michigan, HISCOCK of New York, MCKINLEY of Ohio, REED of Maine, and Levi P. Morton of New York. [Applause on the Democratic side.]"

Then there is an arraignment of the Republican party, in which he says, among other things:

"They refused to execute the eight-hour law and defeated the resolution favoring its enforcement."

Now, the gentleman finds this record, as he thinks—or as he does not think, for I believe I am justified in saying the latter—and parades it here because of the statement it contains that Mr. Morton, the present candidate for the Vice-Presidency upon the Republican ticket, voted as the gentleman has indicated. So far as my own record is concerned I am ready to take care of it, and I would not have called attention at this time to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] were it not that his statement is exactly contrary to the fact so far as Mr. Morton is concerned. I have in my hand the Journal record of the vote to which the gentleman referred, first session Forty-sixth Congress, May 8, 1879. If the gentleman consulted the RECORD he should have consulted the Journal also, and if he had done so he would have found that instead of 127 there were only 126 yeas on that vote and 90 nays. Mr. Morton, along with sixty-nine others, not voting.

Again, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] arraigns the Republican party for laying this resolution upon the table. Mr. Speaker, at that time the Democratic party had almost two-thirds of this House, and it had a majority of eight in the Senate, and the resolution when it failed failed in a Democratic House and a Democratic Congress. But the gentleman takes great care in his statement not only to misrepresent Mr. Morton, but also not to speak of the vote upon the same resolution in the second session of the same Congress. In the second session of that Congress, the Forty-sixth Congress, the same resolution was passed under a suspension of the rules, by a vote of—years 130, noes 51, and amongst those voting in the affirmative is found the name of Mr. Levi P. Morton. (See Journal, second session Forty-sixth Congress, pages 1490 and 1491, June 14, 1884.)

In stating the result of the first vote the gentleman from Indiana mentioned the names of certain Republicans, but he carefully omitted to mention the names of a large number of Democrats who voted the same way, amongst them Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. Clark, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. FORNEY, Mr. Hammond, Mr John T. Harris, Mr. Miles, Mr. MILLS, Mr. Morrison, Mr. REAGAN, Mr. Sparks, and many others.

Now, I repeat that I have not risen on this occasion for the purpose of discussing the merits of this proposition. I will take care of my record whenever I think it is necessary, and I only ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] to do as I do, at least in one particular. I ask that when he undertakes to take care of his record or to attack the record of other men, he will produce the record as it is and not state it exactly contrary to the fact.

Reserving my time, I yield the floor for the present.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 37, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, page 1161, he will find the following proceedings:

"Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken—

That is, upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table.

"Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays.

"The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 38, noes 126.

"Mr. RICE. I would like the Chair to state the question on which we are about to vote.

"The SPEAKER. The question is upon laying upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution and amendment were laid on the table.

"Mr. COX. Those in favor of the joint resolution will vote 'no.'

"The SPEAKER. And those who want to kill the proposition will vote 'ay.'

"The question was taken; and there were—ayes 127, noes 90—"

And among those recorded as voting in the affirmative is Levi P. Morton, of New York, and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois.

That is the record upon which I made my statement.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman know that the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not the highest evidence in a matter of that kind? [Jeering laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BYNUM. The RECORD is made daily and laid before members every morning, and they examine it with reference to their votes, and they never see them as they are recorded in the Journal.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me to state that the Journals of the House speak the action of the House; and I ask the gentleman now if he did not quote Mr. Morton from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as voting in a certain way, knowing that the Journal showed the contrary? Will the gentleman answer that question? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. I say to the gentleman that I went to the RECORD for this vote, and found it as I stated it, and examined no further; and I believe the RECORD is correct. I have not examined the Journal, but I will do so, and I have no doubt that when I do so I shall find that the gentleman has not stated it correctly.

Mr. CANNON. Here is the Journal. I will show it to the gentleman, and I ask the gentleman again if he did not know that the Journal showed to the contrary of his statement?

Mr. BYNUM. Does the Journal show the yea-and-nay vote? [Cries on the Republican side of "Answer!" "Make him answer!"]

Mr. CANNON. It shows the yea-and-nay vote. Here it is.

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman say that the vote on the motion to lay the resolution on the table is recorded in the Journal?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. BYNUM. I say to the gentleman that the yeas and nays were not taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table. They were taken on the motion to reconsider the vote. The RECORD shows that there was no yea-and-nay vote on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Here is the Journal, and it shows not the 127 ayes as the gentleman stated, but 126, and Mr. Morton's name is not recorded as voting as the gentleman stated he voted.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, while I am up I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement made in the RECORD——

Mr. CANNON. Oh no, let us settle one thing at a time.

Mr. BYNUM. Oh, I have settled that to the satisfaction of the gentleman, I think; and when he comes here and attempts to palm off the Journal as against the RECORD of the House—— [Jeers on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has not answered, and I do not believe he will answer that he did not know what the Journal showed.

Mr. BYNUM. I have stated to the gentleman that I did not examine the Journal, that I examined the RECORD only.

A MEMBER on the Republican side. That is not the question.

Mr. BYNUM. Here is McPherson's Handbook of Politics, publishing that same vote. This is an official record, so far as the Republican party is concerned; and upon this question Mr. Morton is reported in favor of laying the resolution on the table—the same as in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. That is McPherson's Handbook of what year?

Mr. BYNUM. Eighteen hundred and eighty.

Mr. CANNON. What page?

Mr. BYNUM. Page 178.

Mr. CANNON. Ah, the gentleman is now speaking of a vote taken the next session, the second session, of that Congress, when this same proposition was brought up; when Mr. Morton voted to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. He voted "ay." I have that Journal here and McPherson's Handbook, and they agree. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Now, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the record. The Journal which the gentleman reads from shows Mr. Morton as absent and not voting.

Mr. CANNON. That is what I have said.

Mr. BYNUM. I have not examined as to whether it is the same vote or not.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; it is the same vote.

Mr. BYNUM. I have not, of course, had time to examine whether Mr. Morton was present on that day or not; but I will examine the records as to that fact. In the RECORD he is recorded as present and voting; he is not reported as being absent—showing conclusively to my mind that the RECORD is correct on this point. In the Journal he is recorded as being absent on that day and not voting at all.

As I have said, every member of the House sees a copy of the RECORD on the morning of its publication; and every member, to my knowledge, looks over the votes and corrects any vote if he is misrepresented or misrecorded. The Journal is never looked at by any member until after the session, because it is not published until then. While it may be an official record, I say to the gentleman it is not as good a record of the action of this House as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is. Another thing to which I wish to call the gentleman's attention is the fact that the names of members voting on any question are never read when the Journal is read each morning.

So far as this matter is concerned, I will give it further attention, as there seems to be some conflict between the Journal and the RECORD, to see how it originated and what was the cause of it—where the mistake lies. That is all I have to say on that point at present.

I notice in the remarks of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] the statement that the contract-labor law was repealed by the Forty-seventh Congress, not by the Forty-eighth Congress. The gentleman did not make that statement on the floor of the House, or I should have corrected him at that time. I can only attribute this statement of the gentleman to the fact that he was overzealous in trying to obscure the facts in reference to the matter. But it is a fact that the contract-labor act was repealed in the Forty-eighth Congress—not in the Forty-seventh.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois can not excuse himself before his constituents because he may have had some good company on the occasion referred to. The gentleman must answer to his constituents for his own vote; and Mr. Morton must answer for his vote; and every other leading Republican must answer to his constituents for his vote. It is not sufficient for the gentleman to come here and say that Democrats voted with him on that occasion.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire again to say that the gentleman's statement touching the vote of Mr. Morton is not true. It falsifies the record.

The statement that it so appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is mere pettifogging. The Journal of the House shows the action of the House, and shows, as I have stated, that Mr. Morton was not present, was not voting, and did not vote.

Again: I state at the next session, the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, as shown by the Journal which I have in my hand, the motion was made to suspend the rules and pass this same eight-hour resolution, and it received 130 votes—yeas 130, nays 51, not voting 111, and amongst the 130 votes voting yea in that same Congress is the name of Levi P. Morton. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is the Journal.

Now the gentleman says I can not creep out by trying to associate with respectable men like BLOUNT and Morrison on his side of the House to justify my action by theirs. I have not tried to do so. I am responsible for my votes without reference to anybody. I have defended this vote and successfully before the working people and farmers of my county and my district, and I will do so again or I will go to the wall. But I will never do it by rising in my place in this House or out of this House and misstating the record, and especially when it is brought to my knowledge, by then rising and pettifogging instead of rising in my place and acknowledging my mistake and begging the country's pardon and Mr. Morton's pardon for misstatement of the record. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Do I understand the gentleman to say that I have misstated the record of Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BYNUM (holding up the RECORD). Here is the RECORD, and the gentleman can not show it. I dare him to do it.

I will ask the gentleman another question. Have you ever examined the votes of the Journals of Congress to see whether you are recorded correctly or not? [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. I always examine the votes as recorded upon the Journal of the House when a vote is called in question, and when I am seeking to find out how any gentleman is recorded, because it is notorious the vote recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is often erroneous, and the Journal shows the true vote. No man who is careful of his own rights and the rights of other members will make a statement as to a vote in a former Congress without examining the Journal.

Mr. BYNUM. So far as the Journal shows the vote one way and the RECORD another the member at the time seeks to make the correction, and it may have been changed in that way.

Mr. CANNON. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning has an error of the print which covers one hundred and fifty names.

A MEMBER. Sunday morning's RECORD?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; Sunday morning's RECORD, which has been corrected by an order of the House.

Mr. BYNUM. Have you examined the Journal to find out as to your vote?

Mr. CANNON. The Journal is not printed and laid on our tables, while the RECORD is laid upon our desks every morning.

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly it is; and that is just what I have been contending; and that the RECORD is corrected as it is published, while no one ever has an opportunity to see the votes as recorded in the Journal until the session is ended.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the colloquy yesterday I spoke as follows:

Mr. CANNON. Allow me to state that the Journals of the House speak the action of the House; and I ask the gentleman now if he did not quote Mr. Morton from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as voting in a certain way, knowing that the Journal showed the contrary? Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. BYNUM'S answer to this question, according to the Reporter's notes, is as follows:

Mr. BYNUM. I say to the gentleman that I went to the RECORD for this vote and found it as I stated it and examined no further, and I believe the RECORD is correct. I have not examined the Journal, but I will do so, and I have no doubt that when I do so I shall find that the gentleman has not stated it correctly.

It is a duplicate of the page which was taken out, and this is what was put in its place.

Mr. BYNUM. I say to the gentleman that I took this vote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and found it there just as I gave it; I examined no further. I was not aware that there was any variance between the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Journal until the gentleman mentioned it just now, or I would have stated when I first announced Mr. Morton's vote. I believe, however, Mr. Speaker, the RECORD to be correct. Mr. Morton was present, as the roll-calls show, on the 6th of May; they do not show that he was given any leave of absence on the 6th, 7th, or 8th, or that he was paired on this vote. I believe the RECORD to be the best evidence of who voted and how they voted. The yeas and nays in the RECORD are published the next morning in the RECORD of the previous day's proceedings—the vote as published from the original roll-call—while the Journal is not published till the end of the session. The vote as published is taken from a copy of the original. The principle that a copy can not be used so long as the original is at hand is as old as the common law itself. Of course the Journals of the House are official records and as such are evidence of the facts contained, but as a matter of fact the votes recorded in them are but copies, while the RECORD contains the original.

Now, what I complain of is that the gentleman makes himself say that which he did not say in stating he was not aware there was any variance between the RECORD and Journal, or he would have stated it.

There are some minor matters making other changes, but that is the principal one.

Immediately following the answer of the gentleman from Indiana, which I read, is the following:

Mr. CANNON. Here is the Journal. I will show it to the gentleman, and I ask the gentleman again if he did not know that the Journal showed to the contrary of his statement?

The question not being answered was asked again by me.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has not answered, and I do not believe he will answer that he did not know what the Journal showed.

When I asked the question the last time he answered as follows:

Mr. BYNUM. I have stated to the gentleman that I did not examine the Journal; that I examined the RECORD only.

That is according to the Reporters' notes; but he adds, and makes himself say in addition, as follows:

That I did not think and that I did not know that there was any variance between the Journal and the RECORD.

Now, it is not a thing of very great importance, I take it, whether this correction be made or not; but the method in which this has been printed, by reason of the revision of the gentleman, makes the gentleman say, by his correction in his first answer to my interrogatory, that he did not know that there was a difference between the RECORD and the Journal; and that if he had known it he would have so stated it on the floor of the House. Notwithstanding that statement by him, I then appear to go on afterwards and ask that question three different times, which would have been a foolish thing upon my part if the gentleman had really made the answer that he makes after the debate is closed. I want the RECORD simply to show the facts. I want it to show exactly what did take place, and I therefore ask that it be corrected; or I will move that the RECORD be corrected so as to state literally what was said according to the Reporters' notes.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, in response to what the gentleman has said, I wish to state that I revised the language used by myself, and made one or two changes in the wording, just as the gentleman has asserted. In answer to his question on yesterday, I saw, when I had an opportunity of reading the colloquy, that I did not perhaps grasp really what he was intending me to answer. I answered him that I had not examined the Journal. I fully meant what I said there, that I had at no time examined it, and did not know what had been asserted by the gentleman, that there was any variance between the Journal and the official RECORD of the House. I probably was not entirely happy in my construction of the sentence when responding to him, because, as will be remembered, there was considerable disturbance on that side of the House and a good deal of confusion, and I really did not have the opportunity of fully understanding the language of the gentleman. I answered him as I understood his questions at the time, and I meant that I had not examined the Journal up to that time. I did not know that that was the point the gentleman was hinging his question on; and therefore I simply enlarged the remarks in the RECORD according to the truth of the matter. I did not see the Journal of the proceedings to which he referred until after he had sent it to me, and did not know that there was a variance, because if I had known it I should have given Mr. Morton the benefit of what was stated upon the floor of the House.

The second correction to which the gentleman alludes is simply a correction of the same nature so as to answer his inquiry. I do not see, therefore, since I have answered his inquiry, what the gentleman has to complain of. It is an answer of fact, and a mere statement of the fact, and I do not see why he should feel aggrieved. I have given the answer that he wanted given, and therefore I do not see that there is any serious harm done.

I think if the gentleman himself, and others on this floor, would live up strictly to the rules of the House, that the RECORD should contain a verbatim report of what was said without variance or change of any kind, there would be then little difference of opinion between members on such questions as this.

On another occasion, in a controversy with a gentleman on that side of the House upon a matter of fact, there was a question propounded by myself which was not answered, but I afterwards found in the RECORD a long list of statistics which made my answer appear awkward and irrelevant; but yet I did not rise to call the attention of the House to it, ask a correction of it, or allude in any manner to the change.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat singular that the gentleman from Illinois has not discovered some errors in the record of his colleague [Mr. WOODBURN], since he seems to have been reading the proceedings with such diligence.

Mr. CANNON. Does it pertain to this exact matter?

Mr. BYNUM. Not to this exact matter.

Mr. CANNON. Then I really would like to resume the floor. However, if the gentleman wishes to proceed——

Mr. BYNUM. Of course if the gentleman wishes to proceed, I have no objection, and will yield the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call the regular order.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me one word. For the first time in fifteen years' service in this House have I risen to a correction of the RECORD. I may not have talked with wisdom, but I have talked a great deal in that time; but never have I had occasion to rise to a correction. But in a case of this kind I think, while it is not a matter of great importance in itself, when there is a debate or a colloquy back and forth between members, sentence by sentence and word for word, gentlemen on each side should have the right to expect that this would go into the RECORD exactly as it took place. The additions which the gentleman has made place me, as I said before, in a position in which no member of this House should be placed who asks a question of that kind; because the question when first propounded appears to be answered, and yet I go on repeating it three or four times; and certainly I think the House knows that there is no member on this floor who will accept the statement of any gentleman here quicker than I will and there let the matter drop. But since the gentleman did not answer my question, and as I regarded it as a matter of some importance, I persisted in asking it, believing that the gentleman was not disposed to answer it, and doubted in fact whether he could answer it. Hence, I repeat, this addition to the RECORD makes me appear foolish by putting a full answer to the first question where it was not given.

Mr. BYNUM. I simply insist, Mr. Speaker, that I had given a full and sufficient answer to the first question, and one that would have been understood by any one not laboring under excitement, when I said that I had not examined the Journal, or compared the Journal and RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I heard the gentleman say that distinctly.

Mr. MAISH. And I also.

Mr. BYNUM. And I will state further, that the report as made by the Reporter was not in all respects an exact copy of the words used by myself. Some words are there inserted that I did not use and some left out, the report having been evidently corrected by the Reporter himself. The gentleman well knows this is often done.

Mr. CANNON. I think in justice to the Reporters it is but proper to state that, in my opinion, this is, I was going to say, an absolutely verbatim report, as I recollect it. But I am not here to discuss whether the gentleman did or did not answer my question. I am here only to assert the rights of the members of the House that the record of a controversy of that character shall embody a true statement of the controversy; and I therefore ask that the correction I suggest shall be made, and the motion for that purpose adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD will stand corrected. There seems to be no controversy between the gentlemen as to the facts; and it will be corrected in the permanent edition of the RECORD. Of course those that are printed can not be recalled.

Mr. CANNON. Of course not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that in my absence there was a call of the House. I desire to say that I was engaged in the examination of witnesses in an investigation in my committee-room.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 142, nays 21, not voting 162; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYSON, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. MACDONALD is paired with Mr. DAVIS on all questions for the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole, and the Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill 10614, a bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, with an amendment to section 5, offered by Mr. PAYSON, of Illinois.

Mr. HOOKER. I want to know whether that is the first business on the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that unanimous consent was given to pass over other bills on the Calendar and consider this bill.

Mr. HOOKER. When was that given?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not recollect the day; but if the gentleman so desires, the Chair will have examination of the record made.

Mr. HOOKER. I would like to know whether this bill has precedence over other bills or not?

Mr. SPRINGER. The first bill on this subject was the regular order at the time the House went into the consideration of it as the unfinished business of that committee under the rule of the House; and by unanimous consent the bill H. R. 10614 was taken up in lieu and took its place.

Mr. HOOKER. The point which I make is whether or not there were other matters on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole which had precedence of this bill and how they were passed over.

Mr. SPRINGER. There was unanimous consent——

Mr. HOOKER. Never you mind. I am asking the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised whether anything had precedence or not; but the Chair finds that there was unanimous consent to consider this bill, and that gives it priority over everything.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not remember of any unanimous consent being given for its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is quite positive that that was the order, and will cause the record to be examined.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was not unanimous consent to pass over other bills. There were two bills on this subject. One of them had been partly considered. This bill was substituted and took its place on the Calendar and has been considered; general debate has closed, and a part of it has been considered under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed, in section 5, to strike out the words "at a price of $1.25 per acre," in lines 12 and 13, and insert "under the homestead laws, only excepting that section 2301 of the Revised Statutes do not apply."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleague what time he wants to debate this question? I think we ought to agree on the time for the discussion of the amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to say that I think this one of the most important questions in regard to this bill. It is of vital importance, and if this bill should pass I would regard it as of greater importance than perhaps any other feature. Whatever bill shall pass should be such a bill as shall meet general approval.

And as this is an important question, presenting the general proposition of the application of the homestead principle, and that alone, to this great area of land, I ask consent of the committee that I may proceed to submit such observations as I desire to make upon it without any special limit, promising that I will confine myself to my invariable practice of simply saying what I have to say with reference to the subject-matter which the committee is considering.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman state how much time he requires?

Mr. PAYSON. I can not state that exactly.

Mr. SPRINGER. You can certainly approximate it.

Mr. PAYSON. I will say to my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] that I desire only a reasonable amount of time.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no disposition on the part of the committee to limit debate unreasonably.

Mr. PAYSON. Nor have I any disposition, as I never have had, to consume time unnecessarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] asks unanimous consent to conclude his remarks upon this amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a suggestion. Inasmuch as this is one of the most important features of the bill, presenting the question of whether these lands shall be sold at $1.25 an acre or shall be devoted to homesteads for the people under the homestead law, I suggest that the committee allow an hour's debate upon the proposition, half an hour upon each side.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. HOOKER. I think we ought to have a longer time than that, because there are several gentlemen here who desire to be heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. Say two hours, then.

Mr. HOOKER. Let the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] proceed with his remarks, and when he concludes we can then agree upon the time that shall be occupied by other gentlemen. I desire to be heard myself upon this question, and my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] also desires to speak, and I would rather have him heard than myself.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will agree that debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close at 5 o'clock to-day, provided we can take a vote upon the bill immediately after the consideration hour to-morrow.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not agree to anything of that kind.

Mr. PAYSON. I think we can get along better by letting the matter take the regular course.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will give you [Mr. PAYSON] only five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Chair to submit my proposition that the debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be closed at 5 o'clock to-day, which is the hour at which this committee must rise.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one request for unanimous consent pending. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] withdraw his request?

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to seem greedy, but I do wish to have time enough to present such ideas as I have upon this subject, and I must insist upon my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] insists that his request be put to the committee that he be allowed time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not to exceed one hour. Does the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. PAYSON. That my own remarks shall not exceed one hour—I agree to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. And that an equal time be allowed for debate on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed and conclude his remarks, occupying not to exceed one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. And that the same length of time be allowed for debate on this side.

Mr. HOOKER. I think there ought to be more time than that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HOOKER. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman, but I do object to its being qualified in the way suggested by the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not object to the largest latitude of debate upon this bill, but I think there ought to be some understanding as to when it is to end. This bill has been under consideration before, and no disposition has been manifested to rush it through, or to hasten it unreasonably. If we have not been considering it for the last hour and a quarter it is not the fault of the friends of this bill. They have been trying to have it considered, and there has been no disposition to stifle any legitimate debate on this bill, and there will be none.

Mr. HOOKER. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so, for I want to speak an hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will agree to take a vote on this bill to-morrow at 4 o'clock, I will agree that he may occupy three hours.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] that he be allowed to proceed and conclude his remarks, occupying not to exceed one hour?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to interfere with that request, for I am in favor of permitting the gentleman from Illinois to occupy an hour. At the same time it seems to me desirable to fix a limitation upon debate on this proposition. Inasmuch as no action can be reached this evening, I suggest that this bill, if gentlemen will consent, be taken up to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal, and the debate continue until half past 1 o'clock.

Mr. RYAN. Why not go on with the debate this evening?

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean that the debate continue this evening and also to-morrow morning until half past 1.

Mr. HOOKER. On this section?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will agree to that.

Mr. RYAN. That is very generous.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That would cut out the hour for the consideration of bills from committees. Unless that is excepted I shall object. The committees have only been called about half way through. I desire that committees farther down on the list shall have some show.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole can not take any action to interfere with the consideration hour. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] please restate his proposition?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], as I understand, wishes the committees called to-morrow morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole can not make any arrangement which will interfere with the consideration hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. We can have it understood at what time debate in the Committee of the Whole shall close.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that debate in Committee of the Whole close at 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HOOKER. I suggest to my friend from Indiana that it would not be well to fix a time now for the termination of debate, for we do not know what time may be occupied to-morrow in other matters, and hence can not foresee what would be the effect with reference to this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] objects, as the Chair understands.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be limited to two hours.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time would the gentleman like?

Mr. HOOKER. I want an hour for myself.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I will modify my proposition by proposing a limitation of three hours, and will agree to give the gentleman from Mississippi one whole hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois modifies his request so as to limit debate on this section and all amendments thereto to three hours. Is there objection?

Objection was made.

Mr. SPRINGER. We are now operating under the five-minute rule, so that, unless by unanimous consent, no gentleman can occupy more than five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] be allowed one hour now.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to submit a suggestion. I am not seeking this opportunity to address the committee for the mere purpose of talking.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that very well.

Mr. PAYSON. I presume the gentleman knows me too well to suppose anything of that kind.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. Nor do I need to be reminded that we are operating under the five-minute rule, which would seem to be a kind of threat that, unless some arrangement be made, I may get only five minutes. I am animated by one purpose only. I think I have some suggestions with reference to the pending proposition which it may be worth while for members to hear. If I did not think so, I would not ask to occupy one minute. If unanimous consent be granted that I may speak, I will agree in advance to consume only so much time as may be necessary for me to say once for all what I have to submit on each proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. I concede everything the gentleman says. I am anxious to hear him speak an hour on this bill if he desires to do so, and will use every means in my power to accord him that opportunity. I desire, however, that other gentlemen may indicate how much time they wish, so that the whole time to be occupied may be included in one arrangement.

Mr. HOOKER. Then let the proposition be made that a given amount of time be devoted to this question—not that the debate terminate at a certain hour.

A MEMBER. The request was for three hours.

Mr. HOOKER. Very well; three hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition submitted was to limit debate on this section and all amendments thereto to three hours. That would not be interfered with by the consideration hour to-morrow; for there would be three hours in any event.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the proposition.

Mr. RYAN. And I understand the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] agrees to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]?

Mr. HOOKER. That applies only to this section?

Objection was made.

Mr. CHEADLE. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that if he will allow his colleague [Mr. PAYSON] to consume whatever time he desires, there will be no difficulty afterward in making some arrangement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have sought to make an arrangement by which all gentlemen could be accommodated. I suggest that there be allowed on this section and all amendments thereto three hours of debate, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] shall be entitled to one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in three hours, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to have the right to occupy one hour or such portion thereof as he may deem necessary. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. HOLMAN. And that the balance of the time be equally divided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] is entitled to the floor. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. PAYSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the control of the time has not been stated in the proposition.

Mr. RYAN. The proposition conceded one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], and that the other two should be equally divided between the friends of this proposition and those who are opposed to it.

Mr. HOOKER. No, I did not understand that. I was to have an hour according to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOLMAN. I could not consent to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that there was to be time allowed to any gentleman, except the hour, or so much thereof as he may desire, to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no objection, I presume, to the gentleman from Mississippi controlling the hour that is left in opposition to the bill after the gentleman from Illinois has concluded his remarks.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not want to deprive other gentlemen of the right to be heard.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the gentleman can yield the time.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not want to exclude my friend from Georgia and others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to divide the time fairly.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment embraces the disposition of 23,267,000 acres of the public lands by the Government at some time. The proposition contained in the pending bill is substantially this: that these lands as at present situated are subject to some burden of Indian claims; and for the purpose of this amendment it is necessary to discuss the question of this Indian right, and somewhat in detail the amount of money which will be required for its extinguishment.

The bill is based upon the assumption that an amount of money not exceeding $1.25 per acre may be required to extinguish the Indian right of occupancy upon each acre of the lands embraced within the scope of the bill; and if the maximum amount of money should be required it will amount in round numbers to about $30,000,000 before the entire Indian title is extinguished so that the lands can be opened to settlement.

The amendment that I have offered proposes in terms that so fast as the Indian title shall be extinguished, and the lands shall become public lands and opened to settlement, the homestead principle of our laws shall apply to them and to every acre of them. That is to say, that every 160 acres of the land shall be treated as a free gift from the General Government to any settler who shall go upon it for the purpose of making it a home for himself and family, and shall occupy it for that purpose for a period of five continuous years; and it presents, at the threshold, Mr. Chairman, a question which has been a prominent one in the mind of the public since 1861, when the homestead law was enacted.

Mr. BRUMM. Let me ask the gentleman if this includes the soldier's occupancy right, as well?

Mr. PAYSON. There is no interference, I will say in passing, and in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], with that right, and that the proposition I have made leaves the law just as it is as to the rights of the honorably-discharged Union soldiers. All gentlemen present, I assume, understand what they are. There is no change of law as to the recognition of the rights of any honorably-discharged Union soldier to make a homestead on the public lands, and no interference whatever with him in that regard.

Mr. BRUMM. Does it make these lands applicable to soldier's homestead entry?

Mr. PAYSON. It does in express terms.

As I was saying——

Mr. GROSVENOR. The soldier's right of occupancy is perhaps not clearly understood by all of the members present.

Mr. PAYSON. I think perhaps it is unnecessary to consume the time in discussing the details of the rights of the Union soldiers to make homesteads on the public lands; and I shall not go into that subject further than simply to remark that the existing law remains unchanged.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the general proposition, which presents the question to the House whether or not this land, when it shall be freed from the claim of the Indian occupancy, whatever that claim may be, shall come within the homestead principle as it is understood, and as it has been understood since the homestead question was settled as a part of our legislation in 1861.

I do not appreciate that kind of generosity in any act which does not carry with it any burden; and the proposition in this bill, which is denominated a homestead principle, but at the same time couples with it a compulsion upon the settler to pay $200 for each quarter section of land, is, in my judgment, not a homestead provision as the people of this country understand it. The people upon the frontier, the people in the great Northwest, indeed the people throughout the country everywhere, who would seek to take advantage of the settlement rights in this bill as presented, understand what a homestead right is. They understand it to be a right to make a home upon lands which the Government gives to the settler, if he will endure the hardships and privations of frontier life for five continuous years, and make his home upon the lands. This bill, while breathing the word of promise to the ear, breaks it to the hope in every instance.

It assumes to be a homestead law, but requires a purchase from the Government in every instance.

The landless poor can not take, as now, a homestead; but the man of means—one able to purchase, one who has means—can secure a home on this land. By present existing law as to lands that cost but little we are generous, and cheerfully give them to the settler; but as soon as a case like this appears, when a little money is required from the Treasury to clear a title for a citizen's occupancy, we still use the term "homestead," but our generosity vanishes before our idea of economy, and as soon as the exercise of the sentiment becomes the slightest burden we cease to exercise it if we pass this bill.

I believe in the continuance of the blessing of the homestead law—of continuing it in principle, in all its beneficence, in fact as well as in name—and I oppose this bill because it compels the settler to pay, as I have said, into the public Treasury $200 for the farm he takes under its provisions; and without going into a discussion, in order to save time, as to the merits or demerits of the homestead principle as it is in existing law, it is only necessary to say that if there is one question upon which there is a unanimity of public sentiment this entire Union over, it is one of approval as to the homestead idea in the settlement of the public lands. And, Mr. Chairman, since I have been in public life it has always been the controlling idea with me that the only method by which the public lands should be disposed of—that is, lands which are susceptible to agriculture—is as a free gift from a great and rich Government to the poor of its own people. I believe that the strength of our nation depends upon the general subdivision of our immense area of public lands susceptible of making homes amongst all of our people and the distribution of them for the largest possible number of those who occupy them.

Now, why is this proposition requiring payment in this bill? Why, Mr. Chairman, is there a different rule adopted with reference to the disposition of this area of our public lands from that which has been in operation since 1861 throughout the Union? The answer has been indicated by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in this, that these lands are costing the Government something. It is that this land is going to require, out of the public Treasury of the United States, a payment of some money, greater or less in amount, for the acquisition of the title, as my colleague states it, before it shall be subject to entry under the law; and therefore it is a matter of justice between those who settle here and the rest of the people who pay money into the Treasury that the public shall not suffer loss, but that the amount so paid out shall be reimbursed to the Treasury by those who occupy the land. That is the answer made. Mr. Chairman, there has never been an acquisition of an acre of public land by the extinguishment of these Indian titles but has cost this Government something. I think I am not far from correct in assuming that there are few gentlemen here who can determine precisely how the account stands and what the financial relation under a debtor and creditor system would be between the public land on the one side and the Treasury on the other.

But, sir, before going into the details. Since 1830 the policy has been a continuous one, that the General Government would extinguish by purchase under treaty in one form or another the Indians' right of occupancy to all lands west of the Mississippi River.

That policy has continued from that time till now; and without going into details as to what the Indian title was, it is enough for me to say for the purpose of this argument that it has always been recognized by the Government of the United States that the Indians—the red men upon this continent—had the right of occupancy as against the title of the General Government, and which right of occupancy should be extinguished by purchase from them before the title should be held to be free and clear to the General Government for the purpose of survey and disposition.

How many gentlemen understand how much has been paid under this item alone for the extinguishment of the Indian right of occupancy of lands in the Northwest and in the extreme West during these years? I hold in my hand, sir, a report of the Public Lands Commissioner for 1883 where is a tabulated statement upon this question, and it is brought down to 1880, showing the amounts paid to the different Indian tribes for the purpose of extinguishing the Indians' right of occupancy to their land in the Northwest. In the statement a very large body of public lands has been included, and in this period there has been paid $187,328,903 down to 1880; that is as far as the figures go. But bringing them down to 1883, there were $208,776,000 paid to the different Indian tribes for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, was the question ever presented, when the homestead law was discussed in 1861 and in 1863, whether or not as a matter of justice the amount of money which was paid by the Treasury in extinguishing Indian titles was or ever should be reimbursed to the Treasury? The question was never suggested; never, sir, never.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman give the statistics of how much the Government realized from the sale of these lands under the various laws which have been in force since the lands were acquired?

Mr. PAYSON. The question of economy, Mr. Chairman, was never debated when the homestead question was presented in Congress, except in one instance, and I make allusion to it with the distinct understanding that I am not introducing politics into the consideration of the bill. When the first homestead law was vetoed by President Buchanan his veto was principally upon the ground that Congress had no right to donate these public lands to settlers, but that there must be a quid pro quo for every acre of the public lands disposed of. The next Congress which assembled, on both sides, sat down upon and crushed that idea; and from that day to this, with the exception of isolated Indian reservations and military reservations here and there, which were abandoned when the purposes for which they were created were no longer in existence, and these reservations thus abandoned had become specially valuable because of neighboring settlements, and their proximity to cities rendered them especially valuable, and therefore not proper to come under the homestead principle—with the exception of legislation in these cases, the question of the cost of the extinguishment of the Indian title and the Government acquisition of title, or the cost of title, where a title was acquired from foreign powers, has never been mooted in Congress until the present session in the Sioux reservation, one reservation in Minnesota, and by this bill which we are now considering.

Let me ask the chairman of this committee this question: When we made the great Louisiana purchase from France, for which we paid $27,267,000, in the disposition of the land embraced in that was there ever a question raised when these lands were to be disposed of under the homestead law as to whether or not the land the Government thus gained should be paid for by the homestead settler? And was it proposed the Government should be reimbursed this fund? Not at all! The Florida purchase was made in 1819 and cost $6,489,000. That land was subject to and is being disposed of to-day under the homestead law. No question was ever made as to the amount of money which was expended in its purchase. Again, under the treaty with Mexico, when we acquired the immense territory west of the Mississippi and on the Pacific coast, for which we paid $15,000,000, as well as the burden of that whole war with Mexico, its cost in life, and expenses, no question was made in Congress in reference to the disposition of the land to be taken under the homestead law of the amount that was paid for the purchase in money besides the blood and the lives that were expended in its acquisition by the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has not the Government realized from the sales from lands to which my colleague has referred many millions of dollars in excess of what it paid for them?

Mr. PAYSON. I agree that the experience in the disposition of the land under the pre-emption law has brought large profit to the Government, but I am discussing now the legislation which resulted in the homestead act, and I say that the question was regarded as higher and broader than the question of dollars and cents. It was the question of the duty of the Government to its poor but deserving people who desired to make homes. That is the argument to which I am now addressing myself, and I hope I make myself understood.

Mr. SPRINGER. But along with the homestead law there was the pre-emption law, which allowed commutation by six months' residence and the payment of $1.25 an acre; and also the desert-lands act and also the railroad-lands act; so that by the laws which were running at the same time the homestead law was in existence persons were permitted to purchase lands.

Mr. PAYSON. I agree to that; but I hope my colleague will not anticipate me. Payment was permitted, but not compelled as under this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. But in the case of Oklahoma there is no other provision for taking the lands except by the payment of $1.25 an acre, which is to go to the Indians.

Mr. PAYSON. I understand that and assert that as my ground of criticism, and insist if we are giving a homestead let us give it; I favor and urge that; but does not my colleague know that every acre which could be taken under the pre-emption law could be taken also under the homestead law? There never has been a time in the history of public land legislation in this country—I speak with confidence as to this—when an acre of public land could be taken under the pre-emption law (for which the taker was bound to pay the Government at a price not less than $1.25 an acre) that could not have been taken under the homestead law. That being so, it only emphasizes the point I am at present discussing, which is that the homestead law involved the question, as I said a moment ago, of a recognized duty on the part of the Government as its established policy, approved by public sentiment, towards its poor citizens to give them homes on the public lands without regard to the expense which was incurred in securing title to those lands. I can not state the proposition any more clearly than that.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERS. If the gentleman's position be correct, then certainly all fees under the homestead law should be abandoned.

Mr. PAYSON. No; I do not think so; because it is no burden, when the settler makes his proof at the local land office, to pay the small amount of fees charged, which, aside from the cost of advertising, do not, I believe, exceed $8 for a quarter-section. I may not be strictly accurate about the figures, but my information is that outside of the cost of the advertisement in the newspaper the fees run from seven to ten dollars. That is simply a matter of paying the agents of the Government for performing the work which furnishes the evidence of title, receiving the proofs, filing the affidavits, forwarding them to Washington, securing the patent and delivering it. No settler ever regards those fees as a burden. But that is a very different proposition from requiring the settler to pay $200 for his little farm, and these fees besides.

Now, Mr. Chairman, resuming the line upon which I was making suggestions when I was interrupted, for the purchase which we made from the Republic of Texas, which includes a portion of Southwestern Kansas, the eastern portion of Colorado, New Mexico, and a portion of the Public Land Strip, part of the very lands embraced in this bill, and which, by the bill, are to be free to homesteaders—for that purchase we paid the then Republic of Texas $16,000,000, in 1850. Why, I ask the chairman of the committee, if you are going to compel the settlers who go upon the lands embraced in the Indian Territory to pay the amount which the Government is compelled to expend in order to extinguish the Indian title, why do you not compel the settlers who go upon the three and a quarter million acres of land in the Public Land Strip to reimburse the Government for that proportion of the $16,000,000 which was paid out of the public Treasury for that land when we secured it from the Republic of Texas?

Later, in 1853, we made a purchase from the Republic of Mexico; what is known as the Gadsden purchase. For that we paid Mexico $10,000,000. And, Mr. Chairman, I desire here and now to correct a statement which was made by the chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. SPRINGER] when this matter was under discussion on a former occasion. My colleague at that time said that when the Gadsden purchase was made it was acquired in pursuance of a treaty with a foreign government, and at the close of a war, for the purpose of indemnifying the General Government for its expenditure in that war, namely, the war with Mexico.

Of course on this matter of history my colleague will correct himself now. He will recognize the inaccuracy of his statement when I remind him of the fact which we all know, that it was the purchase of land that lay there in order that we might rectify the boundaries on the southern line of the Union and secure this area of land by paying that republic what it was worth. And we paid $10,000,000 for that territory. Mr. Chairman, there has never been any suggestion that when that land was subjected to settlement under the homestead law there should be imposed upon the settlers upon it the burden of reimbursing the General Government for the amount which had been paid by it.

So as to the Territory of Alaska, which was our latest territorial acquisition, for which we paid more than $7,000,000. Whenever the public-land laws shall be extended over that Territory will any gentleman stand upon this floor and insist that whoever shall go up into the extreme Northwest and settle there for the purpose of traffic, or agriculture, or mining, shall reimburse the Government for a portion of that $7,000,000? We have already extended the mining laws over a portion of that Territory. To-day one of the finest gold mines in that section, the Treadwell mine, upon one of the islands there, is being operated. Nobody has ever undertaken to insist, or even ventured to suggest, that because this amount of money was paid for that Territory the adventurous people who go up there and utilize the land must reimburse the General Government—not at all.

Now, why should such a rule be proposed in this case? Let it be understood, Mr. Chairman, that the title of the land embraced within the scope of this bill, outside the public-land strip, was in the General Government. For purposes of its own, it adopted the policy of colonizing the Indians upon it. Before this its condition was precisely the same as that of similar land in Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Michigan, and other States in the Northwest. It belonged to the people of the United States, subject only to the general Indian right of occupancy and as to the Indians alone who were then there. The first removals which were made there, as everybody knows, were made from the South, taking the Indians across the Mississippi River from the southern portion of the Union to the land now occupied by the five semi-civilized tribes on distinct reservations and locations. Later on other Indians have been put there. And why? Because the General Government, acting as it believed for the interests of the whole people, thought it a proper and politic thing to burden that land with other Indian occupancy. The title remains in the United States subject to this burden, whatever it may be. And it was presumably for the benefit of the entire people of the Union that additional colonization of the Indians was made there.

Now, the Government, for purposes of its own, acting for the best interests of the people—in the interest of humanity generally—has thought best to make other arrangements with reference to this land. Here, then, is the proposition I make at the threshold of this whole question. These arrangements, whatever they were, these complications whatever they now are, with the Indians within the limits of the Indian Territory, were brought about by Congressional action and for the benefit of the whole people of the Union upon lands the title to which is common property; and whatever is necessary to be done in order to relieve that land from this additional burden, in order to restore it to the people of the Union so that settlement rights may properly attach, ought to be borne, I insist, out of the common Treasury or the United States—ought to be paid for out of the common fund belonging to the people that I represent as well as those represented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] and other members on this floor. That is all there is of it. It may be that it will cost $20,000,000; it may cost $25,000,000; it may cost much less. But whatever the amount which may be paid in this direction, it is simply to relieve that land of the burden which has been put upon it by the action of Congress and for the assumed benefit of the entire people of this Union.

When that shall have been done what then will be its position? It will be public land, free and clear from the claim of everybody. And how shall it be treated? Just as other public lands have been treated—in pursuance of the underlying principle of the disposition of our public lands—the homestead principle and the diffusion and distribution of the public lands in small allotments to actual settlers, with the object that the desert now there shall bloom and blossom as a rose. That is the doctrine which gentlemen on this side, members of the Republican party, have held since 1861. I mean to say that that which was before only a sentiment in the minds and hearts of the Republicans of this country was crystallized into legislation in 1861 by the Republican party in Congress.

And the example we set to politicians of the country then has been followed by all parties since then down to this day. Now no political party in this country goes before the people in a canvass or campaign, township, county, State, or national, that does not have in its platform the principle, when any is announced, the idea, of lands to the landless and free homes to the actual settlers. Everybody agrees as to it. Why should this land be treated differently from the treatment of that farther north?

I have in my hand the treaty made with the Blackfeet Indians, involving 17,000,000 acres in the extreme northern portion of the Union. Every acre of that land is open to homestead settlement, free of any charge except the fees at the local offices. It has been so with every Indian treaty in this country until comparatively recent days, with exceptional cases, such as I have referred to, where small reservations have been held by Indians till settled about by whites and thus made exceptionally valuable.

A portion of the country of the Northwest, where my own home is, was, within the recollection of gentlemen now sitting within the sound of my voice, in the control of the great Pottawatomie tribe of Indians, covering over 30,000,000 acres of land. Thirty millions of acres of the public lands were controlled by this one tribe of Indians; but by treaties, by negotiations, and by the payments of money, many millions of dollars (I have not the figures at hand to state how many), gradually and step by step and mile by mile the area of these Indians' possessions was reduced. They were moved farther west from Wisconsin and Michigan, and afterwards their lands in Iowa, to the extent of 5,000,000 acres in one body, were purchased and the money paid, and they were removed farther west, a small portion living on the reservation in Kansas and others in the Indian Territory, the remainder of them.

But that great empire, an area the finest the sun ever shone upon, held possession of by these Pottawatomie Indians to the extent of 30,000,000 of acres—the title to that land was extinguished precisely in the same way in which it is proposed in this bill to extinguish the title of the Indians to these lands in the Indian Territory, and since its enactment every acre of land which they relinquished to the United States has been subject to entry under the homestead law and without cost. Numerous other treaties were made and the lands treated in like manner.

With the exception, Mr. Chairman, of some two, possibly three bills, which passed this session, this same principle I am claiming here is the principle which has been applied to these Indian lands, the right of occupancy to which has been extinguished, as I have said, the lands have been uniformly subject to free homestead entry. There is all there is of it. So I ask, Mr. Chairman, why should we depart from the well settled plan which has met the approval of the public sentiment of this nation everywhere simply because it may involve an expenditure, and it does involve the expenditure, of a few million of dollars out of the Treasury already overburdened.

The economical question, Mr. Chairman, does not weigh for one moment with me. The time has not come in the history of American legislation when, in my judgment, the just claims of the poor people of this country to free homes on the public lands shall be met and overcome by the assertion the General Government can not afford it. For that is what it means.

Will it be said by this Congress, when this immense area of land—24,000,000 acres in round numbers—an area equal in size to the great State of Ohio, that that land which belongs as a common heritage to the whole people and burdened only by the poor occupancy of some red men, that when the Indian title to that area shall be extinguished, this Government is in that impecunious position it will exclude every settler who goes there unless he shall reimburse us to the last dollar of cost of that land to the public Treasury—when it is remembered, as I have already stated, Mr. Chairman, that land belongs to us precisely the same as the public land of Illinois, Dakota, and the Territories of the great Northwest?

Now, if I have made myself understood, it is all I desire. It is not my habit to indulge in flights of rhetoric for the purpose of enforcing the arguments I make. In a plain, business manner I have endeavored to impress on the committee the importance of this amendment and the necessity of its adoption; and if members of the House believe with me that the disposition of the public lands should be under the homestead principle, then this amendment should be adopted unanimously. That is all I wish to say now, and I thank the committee for its considerate attention.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman desire to reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. PAYSON. I do reserve the remainder of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order the gentleman can use the remainder of the time for himself, but can not yield it.

Mr. PAYSON. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied thirty-three minutes of his time.

[Mr. SPRINGER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Before the motion is submitted I ask consent to submit an amendment which I shall offer to the bill at the proper time. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment is not offered now, as I understand it, but simply presented for information?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, it is presented now for information and to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. That is what I desire.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The amendment of Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, is as follows:

Provided, That all honorably discharged Union soldiers, sailors, and marines, who served in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, shall, in making entries for actual settlement under the provisions of this act, be and hereby are, exempted, in consideration of said service, from the payment of the purchase price provided for in this act; and proof of such actual service for a period of at least sixty days, and of honorable discharge therefrom, by such former soldier, sailor, or marine, shall be accepted by the United States in payment in full of the purchase price of the lands so entered upon, and of all fees in connection with said entry. And all land officers of the United States are directed to give preference to the persons making entries under this provision.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I shall offer that amendment at the proper time.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER that the committee rise was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Oklahoma bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then (the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. having arrived) the Speaker pro tempore, under the previous order, declared the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. HOVEY: A bill (H. R. 11298) for the relief of Francis Burch—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KEAN: A bill (H. R. 11299) for the relief of George S. Newton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. C. A. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 11300) granting a pension to George H. Burgess—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BELDEN: Petition of citizens of Otisco, N. Y., for the passage of House bill No. 11253—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND: Affidavit in the claim of George Barron—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BROWER: Petition of citizens of Caswell County, North Carolina, for amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BRUMM: Petition of Hon. John Tahaney and others, in favor of the anti-convict labor bill—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. BURNETT: Petition of Statira S. Drake, dependent mother of William B. Drake, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BYNUM: Petition of 36 citizens, members of the Woman's Relief Corps, of Shelbyville, Ind., for the erection of a soldiers' home at Indianapolis, Ind.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Knights of Labor of Indianapolis, Ind., to protect free labor against convict labor—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. CATCHINGS: Petition of Margaret Davidson and of Martha Crosby, widow of Peter Crosby, of Warren County, Mississippi, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DORSEY: Petition of citizens of Grand Island, Nebr., in favor of bill to pension Mary E. Adams—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The following petition for an increase of compensation of fourth-class postmasters was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

By Mr. BRUMM: Of J. D. Hepler and others, of Haas, Pa.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 29, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of deficiencies in various appropriations for the service of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888, as submitted by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, amounting to $3,010.75; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT ELECTRIC WIRES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 28th instant, a report from the engineer commissioner of the District on the subject of overhead and under-ground electric wires; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Robert Bolling and other citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the repeal of that portion of the internal-revenue laws which classes druggists as wholesale liquor dealers, and for the reduction of the tax on spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Venango County, Pennsylvania, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Encampment, Union Veteran Legion, held at Youngstown, Ohio; a petition of citizens of Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania; a petition of George M. Spaulding and other citizens of Wellsborough, Pa.; a petition of citizens of Fayette and Greene Counties, Pennsylvania, and a petition of G. W. Rayan Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Middlebury, Pa., all praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, Chosen Friends' Council, No. 86, of Philadelphia, Pa.; of Manchester Council, No. 124, of Allegheny, Pa.; of Orient Council, No. 72, of Johnstown, Pa.; of General McClellan Council, No. 150, of Verona, Pa.; of Laurel Council, No. 126, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; of Shickshinny Council, No. 203, of Shickshinny, Pa.; of Summit Council, No. 173, of Lemont Furnace, Pa.; of Dawson Council, No. 75, of Dawson, Pa.; of McKeesport Council, No. 109, of McKeesport, Pa.; of Mansfield Council, No. 66, of Mansfield Valley, Pa.; of Greble Council, No. 13, of Philadelphia, Pa.; of Fidelity Council, No. 21, of Bristol, Pa.; of O. W. Howell Council, No. 210, of Stauffer, Pa., and of Coopersdale Council, No. 97, of Coopersdale, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill 553, to regulate and restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of West End Lodge, No. 44, Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, of Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against any reduction of the present tariff; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER presented the petition of John Wilson, of New Orleans, La., praying for the enactment of a national election system; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Las Vegas, Territory of New Mexico, praying for the passage of a bill providing for the payment of claims for Indian depredations to citizens living on the frontier; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 47) for the relief of the widow and children of John W. Judson, late agent of the United States at Oswego, N. Y., for public works on Lake Ontario, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1518) for the relief of Maria Black, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2271) for the relief of Rodman M. Price, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back with sundry amendments the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes. I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill to-morrow immediately after the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. REAGAN introduced a bill (S. 3493) to permit the importation of jute bagging free of duty; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, and I ask unanimous consent to make a moment's statement in relation to it.

We are advised that a trust has been formed which has so increased the price of jute bagging that cotton-planters are discussing the question as to whether they will withhold their cotton from market until its operation can pass by. To do so would entail very great damage on the retail merchants and the wholesale merchants who are sustained by them throughout the country generally. This trust is striking at one of the great industries of the country which has no protection, because while cotton forms one of the chief exports of the country, it goes into the markets of the world in competition with cotton from everywhere else. Congress has the power to protect this great industry against this wrong by relieving the duty on jute bagging, and I trust the Committee on Finance will take the matter into consideration and enable us to take some action on the subject.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3494) granting a pension to Charles H. Groves; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3495) granting a pension to Joseph K. Null; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3496) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of John Thomas, late of Company K, Fourth United States Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHACE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3497) making an appropriation for the Girls' Reform School of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3498) for the relief of L. W. Allen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3499) granting a pension to Anna M. Greenfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3500) granting a pension to William J. Pierson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. REAGAN introduced a bill (S. 3501) relating to the classification of post-offices and amendatory of the act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

EFFECT OF IRRIGATION ON LOWER VALLEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] August 21, 1888, in relation to the waters of the Platte and Arkansas Rivers and their tributaries in Colorado. Does the Senator from Kansas desire action on the resolution this morning?

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to have action upon it, but I wish to amend it at the proper point by inserting, after the words "and whether," the words "in his opinion."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read. No formal amendment is necessary, the Senator having the right to modify the resolution under the rule. It will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inquire and report to the Senate at its next session the extent to which the diversion of the waters of the Platte and Arkansas Rivers and their tributaries in Colorado, for irrigation or other purposes, affects the flow of the water of those streams in the lower valleys, and especially during the growing season; and whether in his opinion the title conveyed by the Government to lands fronting on said streams covers the privilege of diverting water therefrom beyond that necessary for use thereon for irrigation and mining purposes, and to report what action is needed to protect the rights of riparian owners along the course of said streams in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to antagonize the resolution, which is a resolution simply calling for information, although I hardly approve of the provision that calls upon an officer not charged with rendering a legal opinion for a legal opinion, which the resolution seems to do. It calls upon the Secretary of the Interior for an expression as to certain legal rights. However, I do not care to antagonize the resolution for that reason.

I merely desire to say that to apply the old rule that each man who has land on a stream or across which a stream ran or by the side of which it ran, has a right to insist that the water shall not be diverted and taken away from him, is an impossibility in what is called the arid regions. While that has been the rule in such regions as are blessed with an abundance of rain, it never has been the rule in any section of the country where agriculture is dependent wholly upon irrigation.

It was decided in 1842 by the supreme court of the State of Illinois that if water by irrigation was absolutely necessary for the raising of vegetation, then it became a natural use, and the right to divert it and to use it all up was the same with the man who used it for agricultural purposes as it was with the farmer who might let his cattle drink the entire stream and thereby cut off the man below.

The rule has always been that the residents who are on the upper part of the stream might take all the water for the cattle if it was necessary. If the farmer's family was large enough to take it all, they could take it all and none was run below. That is upon the theory that it is a natural use essential to his existence. The supreme court of Illinois as early as 1842, as I said, held that that rule must apply also to irrigation in the arid regions, but that it would not apply in the State of Illinois, although agriculture might be increased and made profitable by irrigation, because it was not absolutely necessary.

It has been the rule in all the Western country, where irrigation was necessary, in California, Colorado, and Nevada, to allow the people living on the upper end of the stream to divert it by taking the water out of the stream. The ownership of water there has been determined by prior appropriation. When Colorado became a State, it put a provision in its constitution that the waters of the State were public property, and could not be monopolized, and could not be diverted except under regulations made by the Legislature of the State.

I might say, what I suppose everybody knows, that there are millions and millions of acres of land in the United States on which to apply the old doctrine of riparian rights would always dedicate the land to solitude and silence, and it would be absolutely worthless. Consequently a different rule must prevail; and if the people on the Upper Platte or on the Upper Arkansas divert the water for agricultural purposes there is no damage resulting to the people of Kansas for which they can receive any compensation from any source that I know of.

Of course whatever may be the report of the Secretary of the Interior it will not determine anything in this matter except to give us information. It is a question, as I said some days ago, that the Government will have some day to deal with. I do not know how the Government can prevent the State of Colorado from using the waters of the nonnavigable streams of that State, and that is the character of the streams.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The State of Kansas might sue the State of Colorado for damages.

Mr. TELLER. As suggested, if the State of Colorado should do any damage to the State of Kansas, I suppose a suit might be brought. But the acts complained of are not committed by the State; they are committed by the people. I do not suppose the State of Kansas would ever have any claim for damages, though its citizens might. It is undoubtedly a question that never can be settled otherwise than that the people who are on the lower rivers may be injured, unless we should by some great system of water-works enable the waters to continue in the streams until they reach the lower section of country.

I will say that before a drop of water was taken out of the Arkansas River, before a drop was ever taken out of the Platte River, those rivers went dry; and they have every year since the country was settled gone dry at some point between the foot of the mountains and the points mentioned in the States of Kansas and Nebraska. They sink, and I do not suppose it would be possible, except by an immense expense, to ever keep up those rivers, although no water whatever was diverted for the purposes of irrigation.

I only wanted to say this much, that the Senate might understand that this is a very great question and one not to be lightly dealt with when the report comes in.

Mr. PLUMB. If anything could be settled by a discussion at this time, I should be very glad to enter upon it, agreeing entirely with the Senator from Colorado, that it is an important question. But it was only for the purpose of getting some information which will be accessible to the Secretary of the Interior, to enable the Senate to determine what, if any, legislation is to be entered upon, that I offered the resolution; and no discussion of it, I think, is necessary, certainly not on my part, at this time.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to offer an amendment to the resolution. I move to strike out all after the word "season" in the following words:

And whether in his opinion the title conveyed by the Government to lands fronting on said streams covers the privilege of diverting water therefrom beyond that necessary for use thereon for irrigation and mining purposes, and to report what action is needed to protect the rights of riparian owners along the waters of said streams in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And what measures can be devised to increase the flow of water in those streams during such season.

So as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inquire and report to the Senate at its next session the extent to which the diversion of the waters of the Platte and Arkansas Rivers and their tributaries in Colorado for irrigation and other purposes affects the flow of the waters of those streams in the lower valleys, and especially during the growing season, and what measures can be devised to increase the flow of water in those streams during such season.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will just pardon me for a moment, I do not think any debate will be necessary. I have no objection to the addition of what he has offered to the resolution as it now stands.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make one remark.

Mr. PLUMB. We can then get the information from the Secretary of the Interior covering the entire matter according to his view of it.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not want to involve the Secretary of the Interior in this question of legal rights. It is too broad a question. At least one-half, and I think two-thirds, of all the agriculture that has been pursued in the world has been in countries where irrigation was necessary, and where the rules that applied in England to riparian proprietors had no application and could have none. The common law is a system of principles applicable to the changing conditions of man under any circumstances, but the conditions are different, the facts are different, and the conclusions must be different.

If the Secretary of the Interior had not had this subject called to his attention he would go wrong upon it. Two-fifths of the land of the United States requires irrigation, and different rules must be applied, and that point had better be left out of the inquiry. Let us get the information; let us get what are the exact facts, and then see what remedy can be devised. I have been over that country frequently. I believe that Kansas and Nebraska and a large portion of Dakota require irrigation, and I think when that country is settled up the people will do as all other countries have done when they became civilized, they will store the water in the mountains as India does, and that the region east of the Rocky Mountains and near the Rocky Mountains will be the very best market in the United States.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I should like to ask him a question. He has evidently given this matter much study. I want to know if it is not true that in those countries where the government has controlled the water and leased it to those who used it and used the land which was irrigated, the farming has been profitable to the farmer, and in those countries where private individuals have controlled and leased the water it has not been profitable to the farmer?

Mr. STEWART. Where monopolies have been allowed farming has not been profitable; but the Western States have taken action against the monopolies. California put a provision in its constitution that if individuals sold water the localities, the counties and cities, should regulate the value by their boards of supervisors. Irrigation must be regulated by some governmental authority to prevent monopoly.

The Supreme Court of the United States have recognized to some extent the principles applicable to that part of the country. They decided in the case of Broder vs. The Water Company, in 110 United States Reports, that when water had been diverted for mining or agricultural purposes and the land was subsequently sold by the United States, the purchaser took it subject to the rights of prior appropriators. That principle will have to be recognized.

I did not intend to discuss this question now, for it is too large a question. It involves two-fifths of the lands of the United States, and a rule will have to be applied different from what is applied in the Atlantic States, following the principles of the common law, making them elastic and making them to fit the case where water must be used for irrigation.

Let us have from the Secretary of the Interior the information as to how these streams are affected, and also if any remedy can be applied. I believe a remedy can be applied. I believe if the water is stored in the mountains, which it undoubtedly will be some day, and brought down in the proper seasons, there may be a great deal more in the rivers then than if they staid in the ordinary condition, the water going down in flood time and being wasted.

This is a great question and the result is a very important one. It is an important inquiry, but if we involve the Secretary of the Interior in the question of law he will answer it in some way that may mislead people, that may do harm, because he has not the means or the time to make such an investigation.

I will say of the courts that the courts in the States and Territories most affected are conforming to the condition which nature requires. The State of Colorado has the best system of laws governing irrigation that now exists in any country in the world, so far as that State is concerned, except the part of it which relates to storing water. It has not the right to do that yet, because the places where water can be stored are on Government land. But let us get this information as to what effect the irrigation is having and what can be done, and let my amendment be added to the resolution, keeping the Secretary free from this troublesome legal question as to riparian rights which depend not upon any fixed rule but the condition of the country, which it seems to me it would be unwise to call upon him for.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I heartily approve of the resolution of the Senator from Kansas. I believe that this exploration by the Interior Department will be one that will be productive of great good to the West. I do not, however, favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada if it is to go to the extent of striking out the last part of the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, and if the words which he proposes are to be substituted. I have no particular objection to their being added to the resolution itself, although I believe that that investigation is already fully provided for in the clause of the sundry civil appropriation bill which appropriates quite a sum of money for the purpose. I do not understand that that clause is yet lost in the conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses.

Mr. TELLER. It may not become a law.

Mr. MANDERSON. It may not become a law, but I think it perhaps will be adopted as a part of that bill.

Mr. STEWART. Upon the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Nebraska, I will modify my amendment so as to make it an addition to the resolution, and not to strike out part of it and substitute these words.

Mr. MANDERSON. If it is placed in that form I have no objection to it personally.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be so modified.

Mr. MANDERSON. I can not, however, let the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] go without making further suggestion. I admit the fact that by reason of the peculiar condition of things in the far West, and under the peculiar conditions existing in what we choose to call the arid regions of the West, there has come a very important departure from the principles of the common law with reference to the rights of riparian owners, just as there has come in the mining section represented by the Senator from Colorado a change in the common law as to the ownership of land by reason of what is known as miners' custom or miners' law.

I realize that there is a right in those owning land adjacent to the upper portions of the Arkansas and Platte Rivers to the use for the purposes of irrigation and the improvement of their lands of the waters of those rivers even to the entire exclusion of those who are so unfortunate as to live further down the stream; but I do not believe that that departure from the principles of the common law permits the character of irrigation which I understand is in vogue in the State of Colorado and in other parts of the country where ditch companies are formed, which construct large ditches, carrying the water to a great distance beyond the banks of the stream and irrigating lands not naturally subject to irrigation from the streams themselves. If there are such enterprises as those, and I understand there are, then certainly no principle such as is contended for by the Senator from Colorado can obtain.

Whatever the fact may be, I earnestly hope that this investigation may be had by the Interior Department so that we may have a full understanding of all the conditions prior to legislation at the next session of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. PLUMB. I will accept the amendment as an addition, adding what the Senator from Nevada proposes as a separate inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as now modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inquire and report to the Senate at its next session the extent to which the diversion of the waters of the Platte and Arkansas Rivers and their tributaries in Colorado for irrigation and other purposes affects the flow of the waters of those streams in the lower valleys, and especially during the growing season, and whether in his opinion the title conveyed by the Government to lands fronting on said streams covers the privilege of diverting water therefrom beyond that necessary for use thereon for irrigation and mining purposes, and to report what action is needed to protect the rights of riparian owners along the waters of said streams in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, and what measures can be devised to increase the flow of water in those streams during such season.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas having accepted the proposed amendment, it is a part of the original resolution, and the question recurs on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced the appointment of Mr. BUTTERWORTH in place of Mr. RYAN, resigned, as one of the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 899) for the relief of Mary M. Briggs;

A bill (S. 1070) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary R. Armstrong;

A bill (S. 1880) declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875;

A bill (S. 2721) granting a pension to Jackson Chapman;

A bill (S. 2899) granting a pension to Harriet Welch;

A bill (S. 3076) granting a pension to Mary M. Shattuck;

A bill (S. 3166) granting a pension to William F. Pike;

A bill (S. 3226) granting the Leavenworth Rapid Transit Railway Company the right to construct and operate its railroad through a portion of the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.;

A bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States;

A bill (S. 3474) amendatory of an act authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., approved February 3, 1887;

A bill (H. R. 165) for the relief of H. C. Markham;

A bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3902) for the relief of Sophia B. Moore;

A bill (H. R. 6371) granting a pension to Jesse M. Stillwell;

A bill (H. R. 7013) to place the name of Delia Newman on the pension-roll; and

A bill (H. R. 8087) for the relief of Thomas Strodder.

LAND SUITS AND LAND PATENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions coming over from yesterday, submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], calling for information in relation to land suits and land patents. Shall the resolutions be read at length?

Mr. BECK. Let them be read at length. I should like before they pass to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who was once Secretary of the Interior, to the resolutions. It seems to me that it is going to be very much like the information we had the other day called for by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], where nearly a ton of documents came in. I do not know whether they were ordered to be printed or not. If you count the time employed to work them up and the cost of printing them, I think the documents that came in the other day would cost more than it would cost to run the Naval Academy at Annapolis for a year. These resolutions look to me as if it would require months to procure the information; but perhaps not. I should like to have the Senator from Colorado make a statement about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. STEWART, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate without delay with a statement of what disposition has been made of the following items of appropriation in the acts of August 4, 1886, and March 3, 1887, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1887, and June 30, 1888, respectively, and for other purposes, hereinafter quoted, giving the name of each person who has received any portion of said appropriations and the amount received by each and the character of service each performed, together with the residence of each of said persons at the time he was selected or appointed to perform the service for which the money was paid, namely:

Depredations on public timber: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, $75,000.

Protecting public lands: For the protection of public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, $90,000.

Expenses of hearings in land entries: For expenses of hearings held by registers and receivers, under instructions from the General Land Office, to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries are of that character or have been made in compliance with law, $20,000.

Settlement of claims for swamp-land and swamp-land indemnity: For salaries and expenses of agents employed in adjusting claims for swamp-lands, and for indemnity for swamp-lands, $20,000: Provided, That agents and others employed under this and the appropriations for "Depredations on public timber" and "Protecting public lands," while traveling on duty, shall be allowed per diem, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $2.50 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation. (Act August 4, 1886.)

Depredations on public timber: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, $75,000.

Protecting public lands: For the protection of public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, $100,000.

Expenses of hearings in land entries: For expenses of hearings held by order of the General Land Office to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries are of that character or have been made in compliance with law, $20,000.

Settlement of claims for swamp-land and swamp-land indemnity: For salaries and expenses of agents employed in adjusting claims for swamp-lands, and for indemnity for swamp-lands, $20,000: Provided, That agents and others employed under this and the appropriations for "Depredations on public timber" and "Protecting public lands," while traveling on duty, shall be allowed per diem, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation. (Act March 3, 1887.)

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior furnish the Senate without delay with the number of applications for patents for public lands, including both mineral and agricultural lands, now pending and undetermined in his Department, stating the number of those pending before the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the number on appeal to the Secretary of the Interior; and also a statement of the number of patents issued in each of the public-land States and Territories during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and the amount of land covered by each of said patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the resolutions ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands. The second resolution, I think, is entirely covered by reports which have come in from the General Land Office, showing on the 30th day of June the number of applications that were pending there for patents and the whole scheme of the business of the Land Office. Perhaps that report does not show how many cases were then pending before the Secretary of the Interior or how many were then pending before the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but I am quite sure that a very close approximation could be had to the actual state of the business of that office in reference to the issue of patents by consulting the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office made on the 30th day of June.

I can hardly conceive the use that is to be made of this information after we get it. I am a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and I do not know of any question that is pending there which would call for the information or for that which is contained in the preceding part of the series of resolutions. The object of both the resolutions seems to be to inquire into the matter of how the money in two appropriation acts has been expended, requiring a very critical and exact history of every expenditure, and including a good many matters that I think the Senate would hardly find much interest in reading or in knowing.

I can not conceive what legislative purpose can be aimed at by the Senator from Nevada in asking for all of this detailed information. There may be something that he has a suspicion about as to misappropriations. I do not know; but if there is any instance that can be cited of a misappropriation or anything that looks like it, I suppose the Senate would hardly refuse to make an inquiry into it on the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada. But to put in a general fishing resolution here for the purpose of getting information in a broad, general way as to the history of every expenditure under two appropriation acts, it seems to me is unwise and unnecessary.

The resolutions, as it appears to me, would require the expenditure of a very large amount of money and the employment of a large number of clerks. The Senator requires in the resolutions that these statements shall be furnished "without delay." I suppose that it would cost the Government of the United States in the loss of the services of the different clerks in the Department a large amount of money, and also the necessary delay of the current public business in order to gratify the Senator from Nevada in his researches into the history of the expenditures under these appropriation acts.

Now let us see what is comprehended in the resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate without delay with a statement of what disposition has been made of the following items of appropriation in the acts of August 4, 1886, and March 3, 1887—making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1887, and June 30, 1888, respectively, and for other purposes.

Two fiscal years—

Then the first resolution proceeds to quote the features of the different acts of appropriation and the amounts of money that were appropriated in order to show to what the resolutions are applicable and to indicate the special points upon which the Senator from Nevada desires information. Not only that, but he requires that the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed and give "the name of each person who has received any portion of said appropriations." I suppose that it would be almost a matter of impossibility to give the name of every person who has received any portion of those appropriations; but suppose there is a voucher showing the expenditure of every dollar into the hands of the different individuals who have been employed by the Government, or who in any wise have rendered any service, or to whom any expenditure has been made in the execution of these appropriation acts, what necessity can there be for having "the name of each person who has received any portion of said appropriations" brought before the Senate and the amount received by each, and the character of service each performed?" That would require a very detailed history of the character of the service performed by each individual in respect of each of the appropriations for the two fiscal years, covering a large number of subjects, to which I shall presently refer.

Together with—

He wants also—the residence of each of said persons at the time he was selected or appointed to perform the service for which the money was paid,

I can not understand why the residence of a person who might be employed can enlighten the Senate of the United States upon any question of expenditure. It may or it may not, but it does seem to me that it is merely an effort to dig up everything that has been done in respect of this Department at an enormous expense to the Government of the United States and to the great delay of other current public business, and that the resolutions would inflict upon the Government a misfortune without any good to result from them so far as I can see.

Here are the subjects to which the resolutions relate. In the particulars to which I have referred the Secretary of the Interior must report, without delay, upon these appropriations:

Depredations on public timber: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, $75,000.

That item would include quite a history, I should say.

Protecting public lands: For the protection of public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, $90,000.

This must be of course doubled, because the report covers two fiscal years and the appropriation which is recited here covers but one:

Expenses of hearings in land entries: For expenses of hearings held by registers and receivers, under instructions from the General Land Office, to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries are of that character or have been made in compliance with law, $20,000.

Settlement of claims for swamp-land and swamp-land indemnity: For salaries and expenses of agents employed in adjusting claims for swamp-lands, and for indemnity for swamp-lands, $20,000.

Then there is a proviso:

Provided, That agents and others employed under this and the appropriations for "Depredations on public timber" and "Protecting public lands," while traveling on duty, shall be allowed per diem, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $2.50 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation.

Those items would have to be examined under two appropriation laws. The next is—

Depredations on public timber: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, $75,000.

Every transaction for two years connected with depredations on the public lands or the timber on the public lands is required to be reported in the most minute particular.

Protecting public lands: For the protection of public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, $100,000.

Expenses of hearings in land entries: For expenses of hearings held by order of the General Land Office to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries are of that character or have been made in compliance with law, $20,000.

That would necessitate the production, I suppose, of all the transactions of the different special agents, including their reports.

Settlement of claims for swamp-land and swamp-land indemnity: For salaries and expenses of agents employed in adjusting claims for swamp-lands, and for indemnity for swamp-lands, $20,000.

There is a proviso to that part of the inquiry:

Provided, That agents and others employed under this and the appropriations for "Depredations on public timber" and "Protecting public lands," while traveling on duty, shall be allowed per diem, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation. (Act March 3, 1887.)

Then comes the second resolution, upon which I commented at first, relating to the number of applications for patents, etc.

Mr. President, I do not think the Senate will do the Senator from Nevada any injustice in referring these resolutions, which are of a very extraordinary character, to the Committee on Public Lands and let them investigate them and see what good is to result from having all of this elaborate and very expensive information brought to the attention of the Senate. I know of no bill, no resolution of this body that seems to make this information in the slightest degree relevant, or that it could have any other purpose than merely to gratify some desire of the Senator from Nevada to make an investigation into matters which are perfectly open to him. He has a perfect right to go there and examine the files of the office. I dare say the Senator has never made an application for anything of this kind. No demand has been made probably—we have heard of none at least—upon the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the production and examination by any Senator, or any Member of Congress, or any other authorized person into the details of this matter. Suppose I should come in here, having perhaps some quarrel with the War Department, some desire to inspect all of their dealings, and I should demand that the War Department should send to the Senate, to be printed here for the public information, a detailed statement of every expenditure made by the Department and of every human being concerned in the receipt of money or its expenditure in the War Department, or in the Navy, or in the Treasury, or the Post-Office Department.

The requirement would be just as reasonable, so far as I can see at least, as the requirement of the Senator from Nevada.

A long time ago we abandoned the idea of its being necessary to print and circulate before the world the itemized statements of all the expenditures of the United States Government. What a series of enormous volumes it would fill if we should undertake to do work of that kind in the reports that we require from the Departments. Whenever that rule is found not to be longer useful, when some necessity is found for departing from it, it ought to be upon a case stated, it ought to be in reference to some complaint made of a certain officer, or Department, or bureau of this Government in respect of the manner of expenditure. The Senate of the United States ought not to be required in a case as broad and as general as this is to bring forward by its resolution all of the information that any Senator may choose to have sent in here and printed merely for his own information or his own gratification. The Senator from Nevada, I think, owes it to the Senate that he should state some reason, some particular fact or proposition that he has in his mind with reference to which he would ask the Senate to make this very large appropriation of money.

Mr. ALLISON. I move now that this subject go over for to-day.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to make an explanation after what has been said. I will not occupy more than five or ten minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada. I do not think there is any particular explanation needed, but if the Senator thinks so he may go on.

Mr. STEWART. I want to say a few words.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there is a matter pending before Congress in regard to which this information, if we had it, would be very important in its consideration. There is a like appropriation and a larger one in the present bill; and a system of spending several hundred thousand dollars each year for special agents for guarding the public lands and for various purposes has grown up. It is a new thing. It has got to be the principal expense, the largest item of expense in administering our public lands.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me? I do not know whether the President of the Senate understood that I made a motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator to submit the motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I did.

Mr. STEWART. It has grown up, and you have in the sundry civil bill between two and three hundred thousand dollars—I think it is over $300,000, taking all the items into consideration—for the purpose of investigating, employing special agents, and the like; and there are a large number of them employed. I believe most of it is unnecessary, and I know that it might be rendered altogether unnecessary with the proper legislation. I think, as it has been in vogue some time, it would be well to see how this money has been expended, and what is the character of the service, and who are the persons that have been employed, so that we shall have some light on the subject.

Then as to another portion of the resolutions, wherein inquiry is made as to the number of cases pending in the Department undisposed of, that is important. For example, I received a letter a few days ago from a gentleman in Alaska, inquiring when he might expect a patent for a mineral application. He stated in his letter that it is a long distance and he did not have an equal chance with those people who lived near by; that it took sometimes six months or a year to get a communication from where he was. I addressed a note to the Department, and suggested that I did not desire to interfere with their rule that no case should be advanced, but asked if they could not make the cases from Alaska "special" in some way, so as to equalize them with the others, and what time the person who wrote the letter might anticipate his patent or the consideration of his case. I received a reply that his case would be reached some time late in the year 1890. That was the only explanation. The disposition of such cases ought not to require years. It is a long time in a mining camp to wait four or five years for mere routine business; and if the Department is thus clogged it is important to know what amount of business is there so that we can predicate legislation.

I say the great appropriations now are for investigations and for special agents that are infesting that country, and there are many people who think they are unnecessary. The system of secret spies has not worked well in any country. Secret spies never did work well; the star-chamber business over a vast extent of country like that will do, where no one is allowed to see the reports or ask any questions. Men's cases are tried and disposed of without a hearing. Patents are denied on these reports, which are acted upon as official. It is a system that is working great hardship and it is costing a very large amount of money.

We ought to know how that money is expended. It is a special case. I concur with the Senator from Alabama that we can not inquire into all the details of the ordinary expenditures of the Government. That would be absurd; but when a system of espionage has grown up in the country and a large force of spies is traversing the land and it is contended that it is necessary to continue this system, I think we should know something of it. I am opposed to the system, and I think we ought to have legislation to cut it off. But as long as the system is held to be necessary let us know how the money is used. That is all I ask. And inasmuch as the Department is so far behind that we can not have the ordinary business done, that men must wait for years for their pre-emption and mineral entries to be considered, we ought to know the number of cases there and what legislation is necessary to facilitate them.

If more force is needed in that Department of the routine business to facilitate the consideration of mineral entries and pre-emption and homestead claims, the United States is bound to give what force is necessary to do the business within a reasonable time. It is further behind now than it has ever been in the history of the country. There has never before been a time when the delays amounted to a practical denial of justice as they do now, and the accumulation in the Department, I understand, is increasing. If there is not appropriation enough for that, I would make more. If the appropriations for this system of secret investigation are necessary, let them go on. All I ask is to know what is done with the money, and let us understand what the system is, so that we can judge of it. I believe the system is bad. I may be wrong, but let us see what has been done with the money employed, how many persons have been employed, and what services have been performed. There is no way to act until we have this information. If I get up here and charge this system with being evil, working evil, and being a terrible curse to the people of that region, I shall be told that I am mad at something and go into the newspapers and arraign the officials; but if we have the information so that we can see what is done with the money, and if we can have the information so that we can know why these delays are made, why we have to wait years and years to have our applications for patents considered, then Congress will know how to act, and not till then.

This Department is a mystery; it is a closed book to Congress. Congress appropriates whatever is asked without inquiring what is done with the money. Here is a case where a system has grown up which everybody who will think about it a moment must see can not but be full of evils. Have we not a right to ask for detailed information in this particular case? The labor involved will not be great; but if it should be great, the information called for is of infinite value.

I will now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. If this matter can be disposed of without further debate I will yield a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to refer the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN. There are other Senators besides myself who desire to speak further about this resolution and look into it.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MESSAGE ON FISHING INTERESTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the order to print the recent message of the President be made, leaving the question of reference to stand open for debate. I simply want the message printed so that it may be used by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

THE LOUISIANA ELECTION.

Mr. PASCO. I desire to give notice that on Friday next I wish to call up the resolution offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] with reference to investigating the recent election in Louisiana and submit some remarks thereon.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland, who sits farthest from me [Mr. GORMAN], expects to address the Senate this morning, according to the notice given by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] yesterday. Before he begins his remarks, however, he has kindly consented that I may submit a few remarks in answer to the statements made yesterday by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The Senator from Maine said, in substance—I do not pretend to quote his exact language—that appropriations were being made for public buildings in Southern States largely in excess of those which were made in Northern States, and that it was impossible to secure the passage of bills for that purpose in the cities and towns located in the northern section of the Union, while they were easily procured for public buildings in the southern section of the Union. He cited as an instance of that an appropriation at Helena, Ark., which, I presume, he intended should be taken as an example of an improper appropriation. I sought at the time to get an opportunity to reply, but did not obtain it.

I will say that while it is true as the Senator stated that in 1880 the population of Helena was something less than 4,000, yet I am confident that that population has been more than doubled and that there are at least 8,000 residents in that town at this time. I will state furthermore that the town is located upon the Mississippi River, and is surrounded by cotton lands that are equal to any cotton lands in the world; that it is in the midst of a wealthy and intelligent community, and it is a town that is rapidly growing and rapidly progressing. There has been a Federal court there for a number of years, having jurisdiction in a large number of counties, and considerable business is transacted at that court. It was almost absolutely necessary that a building should be provided for the use of that court, and also for the post-office, and $75,000 were appropriated for that purpose by the present Congress, and the President signed the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think the fact that $75,000 were given for that growing town of 8,000 inhabitants would justify the statement made by the Senator that larger appropriations were going to the Southern States than were going to the Northern States. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] stated yesterday, and I wish to repeat it to-day, that for public-building purposes the State of Maine has had appropriations amounting to $2,231,114. The State of Arkansas has had altogether $309,317. I am not sure whether Helena and Texarkana are included in that amount or not, probably not. The State of Maine had in 1880 a population of 648,936; Arkansas had at that time 802,525. Arkansas to-day has more than a million of inhabitants. I do not know what the increase of population has been in the State of Maine, yet there is the State of Maine in 1880 with 200,000 less population than the State of Arkansas, and yet the State of Maine had nearly $2,000,000 more appropriated for public buildings than Arkansas had. I submit, in view of that fact, if the Senator was justified in saying that these appropriations were going South and they could not be procured for the Northern States.

While I am upon the floor I wish to answer another proposition made by the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Maine complained that the Administration was extravagant, that large appropriations and extravagant appropriations had been made under Mr. Cleveland's Administration, exceeding those that were made under the administration of Mr. Arthur, and yet I do not believe that a single appropriation of any consequence has passed the Senate that the Senator from Maine did not support, except I believe he voted against the Blair bill.

In addition to that, the Senator from Maine when he made that statement knew that twenty-five millions of that increase, as was admitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] yesterday, was accounted for by increased pension appropriations, and yet the Senator from Maine earnestly supported every increase of pension that has been presented for consideration here. Not only that, but he voted for a bill that would have increased the appropriations at least twenty-five millions annually, and, as was generally believed, fifty millions annually; and when the President of the United States vetoed that bill he was denounced as being the enemy of the soldiers of the Union. Yet the Senator from Maine knowing this fact, parades this appropriation of $25,000,000 here as an evidence of the extravagance on the part of this Administration after he himself had earnestly supported it.

Another cause of increase, I am informed, is largely due to the fact of the naval appropriation, appropriations for building naval vessels, and yet no Senator upon this floor was more earnest in his advocacy of large appropriations for building a navy than the Senator from Maine, and I think in every instance he advocated larger appropriations than were given by Congress.

Another cause that will account for this supposed increase of expenditures, as I understood the Senator from Iowa to say yesterday, is the increased cost of the postal service, and yet, Mr. President, again and again Senators upon that side of the Chamber denounced the Postmaster-General for his parsimony because he would not spend more money on the postal service. It has been done on more than one occasion, and they tried to force upon him $800,000 per annum more than he asked for to run for ten years more than he wanted, money that he did not need for ten years, and yet the Senator from Maine says that this Democratic Administration has been extravagant, when he voted to force that $800,000 upon him which he said he did not need for the postal service. Yet, Mr. President, if that $800,000 had been appropriated by Congress, and $25,000,000 more, annually, for pensions had been voted, this would have been arraigned by the Senator from Maine as an element of Democratic extravagance.

Mr. President, I submit that that is not fair politics, I submit that that is an unjust imputation upon the Administration, when it is known that in nine cases in ten for almost every appropriation that passed that side of the Chamber has stood solidly in the affirmative, and that whatever objection there was came from this side of the Chamber. I assert here to-day, while I have not the figures all before me (that counting one year's appropriation of the Blair bill), that bills which have passed the Senate during this present session, a Republican Senate appropriated not less that $50,000,000 which the House has refused to pass; that bills have been passed here in which at least $50,000,000 more have been appropriated by the action of the Republican Senate than has been by the Democratic House of Representatives during the present Congress. One item I remember, that amounts to about $20,000,000, was to refund the direct taxes to the States. That bill passed this Chamber with very few negative notes upon the Republican side, as I remember it, and it has been earnestly pressed in the other House by Republicans, and the Democrats have refused to pass it.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. In estimating the appropriations recommended by the Senate and the amount specified in the educational bill, does the Senator estimate for $79,000,000 in the educational bill, or the $9,000,000 which is the appropriation for a year?

Mr. BERRY. I estimated for one year, which I thought was $8,000,000. The Senator says it was $9,000,000, which adds one million more.

Mr. BLAIR. For eight years the amount would have been $79,000,000.

Mr. BERRY. The first year would have been $9,000,000.

Mr. BLAIR. Between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000; nearly $10,000,000.

Mr. BERRY. Then I stated in round numbers that I find the direct tax would have involved an appropriation of $20,000,000, the pension bill that has passed here would not have been less than $25,000,000 more; that, in addition to the $9,000,000 for this one year of the Blair bill, would make more than $50,000,000, to say nothing about the increase of the large appropriations that have been made for public buildings and various other purposes, to which I presume the Senator from Maryland will allude when he comes to speak. But in round numbers it is safe to say than $50,000,000 has been appropriated by this Senate that the House of Representatives have not yet concurred in, and we have no reason to believe they will.

So far as I am concerned I simply state that it can not be shown outside of these items that there has been any extravagance in this Administration over and above the administration which has preceded it; and I think it is unjust and unfair to go to the country with such a statement as the Senator from Maine has made, that this Congress is making large appropriations for the Southern States, when the facts show that it is not true—to go to the country with the statement that this Administration has been extravagant beyond that of the past in appropriating money, which is not true, and when the Senator from Maine has been the most earnest advocate not only of the appropriation bills that passed, but for the appropriation of millions of dollars which the Democratic House of Representatives has refused to pass.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, in the course of the debate yesterday the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] said:

I notice that there are large appropriations asked for in this bill. I believe that a large appropriation was made for a public building at Portland, Oregon, some years ago. The cost of the public building at Portland alone, if my memory serves me aright, is more than equal to the entire cost of all the public buildings in New Jersey.

Also, in another part of the debate later on, after asking how much was appropriated for Nevada, he said:

How much for Oregon?

That is, how much was appropriated for Oregon?

I think there is some $600,000 for buildings for Oregon.

Mr. President, I do not know why Oregon should have been dragged into this discussion. I sought an opportunity yesterday to answer the Senator from New Jersey, but was unable to obtain it. The fact is that there is not a dollar in this bill for the construction of a public building in Oregon. As the bill passed the Senate it contained a Senate amendment, as follows:

For custom-house at Portland, Oregon: For the purpose of reimbursing the city of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced out its general fund in payment for street improvements assessed to the United States on the custom-house block in that city, between March 1, 1869, and January 1, 1888, $1,271.82.

Even this amendment it seems the Senate conferees have been compelled by the opposition in the other branch of Congress to drop, and they report in favor of receding from it.

Under the laws of Oregon, in the city of Portland, the streets are improved and kept in repair by an assessment on the adjacent property. The United States owns a block of ground on which there is a public building and owns the fee of the streets to the center of the street on each side of the block. There is no provision of law for improving this part of the streets, which belongs to the United States and adjoins the property, except by an assessment on the property. As this assessment can not be collected, the city of Portland has been compelled out of the general fund to make these street improvements from time to time and has presented a claim to the Department. The estimate has been repeatedly made for the payment of it. The Senate Committee on Appropriations saw fit to put an amendment on the bill to provide for the payment of it, and still the House insists that this payment shall not be made, and this amendment is the only amendment relative to public buildings or the grounds for a public building in the city of Portland or in the State of Oregon contained in this bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Oregon if he has not introduced a bill into this Congress for a post-office or some public building in the State of Oregon?

Mr. DOLPH. I will explain that to the Senator in a moment. The Senator said that this bill contained $600,000 for public buildings in Oregon, when it does not contain a dollar.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I simply wished to ask, owing to the explanation that was made yesterday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who has charge of the bill, in respect to the public buildings that appropriations were asked for, if the Senator from Oregon has not a bill before this Congress appropriating quite a large sum of money for a public building in the State of Oregon. If he has not, then my recollection is at fault; and if it is of course I will admit the fact.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator is trying to create an issue with me that I have not raised. I will discuss that in a moment. The point to which I rose and the statement of the Senator that I desire to correct was that there was $600,000 in this appropriation bill for public buildings in Oregon. I say there is not a dollar.

The Senator also drew a comparison between appropriations for public buildings in the State of New Jersey and in other States. I find upon reference to a statement of appropriations and expenditures for public buildings, etc., to June 30, 1882—since that time there has been nothing appropriated for Oregon for public buildings; I do not know how it has been in the State of New Jersey—that the custom-house and post-office at Jersey City is charged with an expenditure of $111,870.58; that the custom-house and post-office at Newark is charged with $159,873; that the custom-house and post-office at Perth Amboy is charged with $3,374.66; that the revenue-office at Sandy Hook is charged with $719.31, and the custom-house and post-office at Trenton with $409,906.56.

In the State of Oregon there has been appropriated for public buildings since the State was admitted, for custom-house at Astoria, which is the first custom-house after entering the Columbia River and a place of importance, $76,047.85; for custom-house at Portland, $396,379.71. That is all that has ever been appropriated for this purpose in the State of Oregon since Oregon was a State. There were some small appropriations for a penitentiary and state-house at a very early day when Oregon was a Territory. The appropriation for the penitentiary at Portland was $60,000, and for the state-house at Salem $33,554.75. Those appropriations were made, the one for the state-house in 1848, and the one for the penitentiary in 1850.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the bill which has been introduced by me in the Senate for a custom-house at Portland, I wish to say that Portland to-day has some fifty-five or sixty thousand inhabitants. It is the point where the customs are principally collected, and the other business—Federal business—in the State is done. It is a building which is an ornament to the city, and in a proper location for the post-office and United States courts. Its capacity to-day is sufficient only for the post-office and for the courts. The internal-revenue offices and the customs office, and all the other Federal offices in the State ought to have other quarters; in fact the internal-revenue collector's office has been recently removed from the building. It now contains the surveyor-general's office, the post-office, the customs office. It has capacity only for the offices for which it was designed—the post-office and United States courts.

Every Federal official at Portland has recommended the construction of a new Federal building. The present postmaster, appointed under the present Administration, and his predecessor say that all the lower story of that building is required for the post-office. The collectors of customs, the present one and his predecessor, say that the accommodations in the present building are insufficient for the public business; besides, the location is not a proper one for a custom-house. The Supervising Architect has recommended during every Congress I have been in the Senate the construction of a new building. The Senate during the Forty-eighth Congress passed a bill making an appropriation for the construction of a custom-house in Portland. The Senate during the Forty-ninth Congress passed a bill and sent it to the House of Representatives making an appropriation for the construction of a custom-house at Portland. The Senate during the Fiftieth Congress passed a bill and sent it to the House of Representatives making an appropriation of $500,000 for a custom-house at the city of Portland; and considering the present population and business of the city and its prospective growth, no building costing less than that can be erected to accommodate the business which will compare at all favorably with other public buildings belonging to the county as well as public buildings erected by the United States in that city.

What has been the fate of the bill in the House of Representatives? I believe during the Forty-eighth Congress it received no attention. Possibly in the Forty-ninth Congress it was favorably reported. In the Fiftieth Congress it was reported favorably and with a recommendation to reduce the amount to $350,000. It was cut down in the Committee of the Whole to $200,000, and there it stands.

It is true that I have introduced a bill for a public building in Portland, and it is required and recommended by every officer of the Government having information on the subject, and the bill ought to be passed. I am only sorry that as the bill was not passed the appropriation for the construction of the building is not in this bill.

But I did not rise to discuss the necessity for a new building, and I should not have referred to it or to what has been done looking to the construction of such a building if the Senator had not referred to the matter.

I wish to say further that I think this amendment providing for the payment of the cost of improving the adjacent street to the custom-house at Portland is a matter upon which the committee of conference ought to insist. Some other appropriations for Oregon have been dropped by the committee, but they are not so palpably just as the one to which I have referred.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I simply wish to make an explanation which I think perhaps is due to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] as well as myself. I noticed that there were certain bills pending in the Senate which I thought had been introduced by the Senator from Oregon, providing for large appropriations of money for public buildings in Oregon. I now have the bills before me, one for the city of Portland, for a public building, at $500,000, the other a public building at Salem, Oregon, in which an appropriation of $75,000 was asked. Both went to the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of having them become a part of this bill. I did not examine the bill minutely, and therefore could not say whether they were in it or not, but I supposed they were, quite naturally.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have not got through. I am speaking in the time of the Senator from Maryland, and I do not wish to take up more than a moment.

The only object I had in view yesterday was to draw a comparison between the practice of Congress in times past under other administrations of this Government in giving large appropriations of money to Western States. The most of them were Republican States, and certainly the South never had anything by way of public improvements from this Government, particularly in the shape of public buildings. Yesterday exception was taken by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] because public buildings were asked for in some important growing cities in the South. I simply wished to draw a comparison between what had been done for Western States and Western Territories and what had been done for my own State. I stated on that occasion that the Government of the United States did not own up to the time when this Congress was organized more than one public building, meaning by that a post-office, custom-house, and court-house, in the State of New Jersey, which was located at Trenton. They did have, it is true, a part of a building at Newark, insufficient entirely for the post-office, and they were required to rent an adjoining property for the use of the post-office. During this Congress we have made appropriations at Newark, a place of 200,000 people, for additional facilities for a post-office, and appropriating $350,000 for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building which is to be used as a custom-house and post-office and office for the internal revenue in the largest collection district of internal revenue almost in the United States, or certainly one of the largest. Then at Paterson, a place of over 80,000 people—let me inquire right here of the Senator from Oregon the population of Portland?

Mr. DOLPH. I told the Senator that the population of Portland and its suburbs was probably about 55,000 or 60,000.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Very well. Now, the city of Paterson, a place of 80,000 people, with a much greater increase of population during the last ten years, I think, than you will find in Oregon, asks for $80,000. The Senator from Oregon asks for $500,000. The city of Hoboken, with a population of 80,000 people, asks for $60,000 for a post-office and custom-house and an internal-revenue office agency as well. Jersey City, with its surroundings, with a population of nearly 200,000, has a public building that has cost perhaps the meager sum of $80,000 for the building and the site. I think this year we were able to get an appropriation of $25,000 to give increased facilities at that point for the post-office.

That is the comparison I wished to make in regard to what had been done for the Eastern States. Now let me state further that during the whole period of Republican administration here, certainly during my term of service in the Senate, lasting now about eleven years, we have been persistent in asking for these facilities for post-offices at the different points I have mentioned, and we have many other cities better entitled to them certainly than cities which are now getting them. We have the cities of Elizabeth, New Brunswick, Camden, Morristown, Somerville, and Plainfield, and many other large cities that are entitled to public buildings by reason of their population and importance; but we have not asked for them, notwithstanding all these appropriations are made at the rate asked for here by the Senator from Oregon of $500,000 for Portland, with a population of 55,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me a moment that I may explain to the Senator from Oregon and other Senators the difficulty we found in the way of providing for the paving of streets.

For the last two or three years the House of Representatives has persistently refused to allow any of these paving items and we have been obliged in all these bills to surrender those paving items. This year, as I think very properly, the House committee suggested to us that it is the duty of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the two Houses to provide some general legislation on the subject, and I think that the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate should be called to the necessity of some uniform rule as respects our duty in regard to the paving of streets about the public buildings which we erect in the different cities of the Union. For myself, I believe that this Government, if it erects a public building in the midst of a city (and it usually erects its public buildings in the most conspicuous portion of a city), should pay its proper proportion of the cost of the maintenance of the streets and the sidewalks in and about that building, and I think there should be a law regulating that matter so that if the Government of the United States desires to maintain the sidewalks and streets about its buildings, its own officers should surpervise the construction of the work. That is the reason why the conferees on the part of the Senate surrendered all these items respecting paving, which of course include the item alluded to by the Senator from Oregon.

If the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] will excuse me a moment further I want to say a word in response to what has just fallen from the lips of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. He seems to think that I criticised the erection of public buildings in the Southern States in my remarks yesterday. The Senator totally misapprehended my remarks. I made no criticism as respects any of the public buildings. I not only did not do that, but I stated that I had voted for all of them. My criticism was that there was not that discriminating judgment as respects public buildings which ought to prevail. I called attention simply to the fact that in my own State there was a city of from 35,000 to 40,000 inhabitants, and when it asked for a public building it met with a Presidential veto, whereas in other States of the Union, like North Carolina, to which I alluded particularly, and Texas and Arkansas, in towns having a small population and but little business, public-building bills by some device were enabled to run through both branches and pass the approval of the President of the United States.

I called attention to two or three instances, one of which was an instance in the State of North Carolina, where this very year we have provided for a public building at Statesville, a town situated 40 miles from Charlotte, where there is another public building now, a town of three or four thousand inhabitants, and that bill could receive executive approval, but when we come to a great city like Sioux City, in my own State, with a moderate appropriation for a public building, where there is great need of that public building, we are met with a Presidential veto. That was all I intended to say in my criticism yesterday as respects these public buildings.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. GORMAN. I will if it does not lead to further debate.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if Sioux City has a Federal court?

Mr. ALLISON. It has.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any public building there now?

Mr. ALLISON. There is not. And now, as we are upon that, I want to say that the President took occasion to say that there was an understanding in 1882 that the county court-house could be used. Of course when the United States court was required to sit in Sioux City, without any public building, the county supervisors or authorities allowed for the time being the United States court to be held in the county court-house; but the county court-house is full of litigation as respects our State courts and State business, and it is absolutely inconvenient for them to allow the United States court to sit there. That is all there was of that.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, in the general statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], as to the condition of the bill now under consideration, and the trouble the conferees on the part of the Senate are having to obtain such concessions as would comply substantially with the votes of the Senate, I am in perfect accord with him; but there is one item in the sundry civil appropriation bill inserted by the Senate about which I desire to say a word before referring to the general statements of the chairman, and that is in regard to the appropriation to condemn the balance of the square upon which the Government Printing Office is now located. I had not an opportunity to make the statement when the bill was pending in the Senate. I trust that the conferees on the part of the Senate will insist on that amendment.

The building known as the Government Printing Office was erected many years ago as a private enterprise, and it is now totally inadequate to the great business of the Government Printing Office. It is so constructed as to make it absolutely dangerous to life, and the ventilation is so bad that it is an outrage upon the poor people who are compelled to labor there daily. It was found, after a personal examination by the Printing Committee, not only in the interest of humanity, for if it were a private establishment I believe the grand jury would condemn it, but also in the interest of the business of the Government that there is not sufficient space to do all the work that is ordered by Congress. The whole machinery of your printing establishment depends to-day upon a single engine, which has been in constant use for the last ten or fifteen years. As a matter of economy, outside of the other question to which I have merely alluded, it is an appropriation that ought to be made, and not a day should be permitted to pass before the improvement is begun.

Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has made several statements, with one of which I concur fully; that is, that in the Senate Committee on Appropriations in considering these appropriation bills politics or party divisions never enter into any item recommended by the committee of the Senate. That I testify is absolutely true since I have had the honor of being associated with my friend from Iowa upon that committee. I have said upon former occasions that in all these matters he as the chairman of that committee, during the time that we have had a Democratic President and a Democratic House of Representatives, has, in the consideration of every appropriation bill, sunk the partisan, and so I may say of every other member of the committee—I allude to him as the representative of the majority. In committee the controlling idea has been the advancement of the best interests of the Government, and he has recommended and agreed to appropriations that have been liberal and which have produced great results.

Therefore, sir, it was that I was more astonished by his remarks yesterday than I would have been by a similar statement made by any other member of this Senate. He having participated in and largely controlled the appropriations as made up to this time, I confess that I was amazed when my friend from Iowa, seconded by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], here upon the eve of a great election, should state the condition of these appropriations and the finances of the Government in such a way that the country must conclude that it was purely for partisan purposes. I confess I was astonished when I heard the Senator from Iowa make the declarations in which he twitted the Democratic party within four years of having made appropriations $95,000,000 greater than were made during the preceding administration of President Garfield and President Arthur, and attempt to stir up sectional feeling, as he unquestionably intended to do by his pointed allusions to the appropriations for public buildings in the Southern States.

So that I may not be mistaken, or rather that I may not do any injustice to him after what he has said this morning, I will read a paragraph or two from his statement of yesterday, found on pages 8829 and 8830 of the RECORD. After alluding to the appropriations for a building in Buncombe County, North Carolina, he said:

Mr. ALLISON. I am not criticising these things except to point a moral, that these little villages in North Carolina, in Texas, in Mississippi, and in Arkansas can have their public-building bills not only railroaded through these two Houses—I have no doubt I voted for all of them—but they pass the scrutiny of the President of the United States; and yet when a bill comes here from the State in which I live and from a city having more than 30,000 inhabitants and nearly as much trade as there is in half the State of North Carolina, the President sends us a message, sneering in its tone and I think undignified in its character, saying that a public building is not necessary at Sioux City.

I merely call attention to these things for the purpose of showing that it depends, or seems to depend, upon the location of these public buildings whether they can become laws. * * *

And again he says:

But I am not finding fault with these appropriations. I am only now calling attention to the discriminations made respecting them, showing how easy it is for certain States of this Union to get appropriations for public buildings where the needs of the public service do not require them as much as they are required in other States and cities where these buildings are actually needed, and I am in sympathy somewhat with the Senator from New Jersey when he says that New Jersey has not hitherto had its share of these public buildings.

He again alluded to the fact that these bills for the Southern or Democratic States were "railroaded through these two Houses," that there was some peculiar influence brought to bear upon the Executive that they might be signed and become laws. I say to the Senator and to the Senate that the way in which he made that statement, the impression that it conveys to the country, and which I have no doubt upon reflection he regrets this morning, are not warranted by the facts.

His party zeal, his desire to bolster up the waning fortunes of his party, is the only possible reason with which to account for his statements. But, Mr. President, the Senator will find that the attempt to renew sectional feeling on appropriation bills will fail, for the people know that with this Democratic Administration there is no sectionalism. There is only the great Union of States, all equal, and there is honesty and integrity in every department of the General Government.

Mr. President, I sympathize with the Senator from Iowa. He was laboring under some excitement, possibly because of the recent veto of an appropriation bill for a building at Sioux City, in the State of Iowa. I can understand how for the moment he would resent it and suppose that he was discriminated against, and if he had made that statement immediately upon the reception of the veto, in hot blood, I could have understood it, for there was another building bill for Annapolis, in my State, vetoed. The State of Maryland, that aided in creating the Government, with its old capital enriched by all the associations running back to colonial times, and the memories of the great events that have occurred there, with the Naval Academy located within its historic precincts, the only capital of a State but one in the Union that has not a public building in it, for it has been a rule that the capitals of all States should have a public building, asked two years ago, and Congress granted it, an appropriation of $100,000 for a public building at Annapolis. Had this bill become a law the appropriation would, in all probability, have been used in such a way as to secure a historical building, one which was used by General Washington, by Lafayette, by Carroll, and other compatriots as a council house before and during the Revolution, and at the same time would have secured a cheap and commodious building for the post-office. The President of the United States in his desire to limit these appropriations, mistaken in his judgment as I believed then, and as I suppose he may have been in the Sioux City matter, but still exercising the discretion that is warranted by the Constitution, vetoed that bill; yet I have no right to say, as the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Maine have intimated, that it was a discrimination against my State because of its location geographically or because of its political relations. The President has exercised that power wherever he has thought best, and I do not believe that we have any right to attribute to him any other motive than that which he states in the veto messages. If we think he is wrong in his views in particular cases we can pass the bills over his veto if we have a two-thirds vote; but the intimation that his action was instigated by partisan consideration or sectional influence can not be sustained by any act or expression of the President.

Mr. President, the Senator says that we have appropriated $95,000,000 more of money in the last four years than were appropriated in the preceding four years. I say to him, that is true; but the items making up the amount of such increase are well known to the Senator. The greater portion of it is necessary and unavoidable, no matter what party is in power, but there is a part attributable alone to the constant and unjustifiable attacks of the Republican party upon the South. I will do the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] the justice of saying that so far as I know this is the first time in discussing an appropriation bill that he has arrayed one section against another, but it is constantly done by his party associates here, in the House, in the country, and through the press everywhere; they have upon certain measures denounced the Democratic party as being controlled by Southern interests. Every vote of a Southern Democrat against a pension or against a claim made by a loyal citizen is heralded all over the country as an evidence of a new rebellion. You have thus excited a feeling in a majority of the States which makes fair, careful consideration of such measures difficult, if not impossible. The result—extravagance, a waste of the people's money. And when the Executive interposes his veto you exhaust the adjectives. Economy and justice to claimants will come only when you cease this unpatriotic sectional war.

But we have voted untold millions for pensions and other matters growing out of the war. I have no doubt if you had not raised such an issue, or prevented that feeling from growing up among your own people, we could have met many of these questions simply upon the facts without reference to sectionalism, and saved millions of money to the tax-payers. But here, in both Houses of Congress, you have with great regularity, audacity, and ability agitated it, and have made it almost impossible to prevent a pension bill, no matter what its demerits may be, from passing either House.

Mr. President, no man will charge me with being illiberal to soldiers. I represent in part a State whose people were foremost in every act that established this Union, a State that has been loyal to it every hour since its existence, whose soldiers in number in the Union Army exceeded those of Maine, and there has never been an occasion, and I hope there never will be while I have a seat upon this floor, when I shall vote against a pension bill that is just and right.

The people of my State sustain me in such votes. During the rebellion the number of Maryland men in the Union Army and in the Confederate army were about equal. The Confederates returned home with everything gone except honor and manhood. Surrendering their convictions, renewing their allegiance to the Government, starting anew in life with no hope of nor desire for pensions or aid from the Government, they are hewing their path through time with a will and energy and success which commands the admiration of all. Standing side by side in their daily avocations with the Maryland Union soldiers whom they see drawing their pensions quarterly, and yet the most earnest and outspoken advocacy of my course comes from these men, and so long as our Legislature is just and liberal they will support us. And yet your party in the face of this opens anew the wounds of a period sad in its memories, but which should never be referred to here.

And yet I say to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Maine that we have gone on at such a rate that it will cost more for pensions to the Union soldiers than it cost to put down the rebellion. Mr. President, the time has come when there must be some just limitation in this matter. Your party has forced the issue; you have forced these immense appropriations, and taking advantage of your acts in the past four years, the Senators who have spoken upon this question now hold the Democratic party up to the country as a party of extravagance!

I say to both of those Senators that it is not fair. I say to them that the time will come at the North, and that soon, whenever distress strikes the country in its great material interests—the time will come when we shall all be held responsible for these extravagant expenditures, and instead of arraigning the Democratic party because of these appropriations it does seem to me, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me to say so (for I have no doubt for some time to come he will be responsible in a large degree for these appropriations), that even now, in a Presidential election, on the floor of the Senate he ought to live by the rule that was adopted in the Committee on Appropriations, and discuss these matters without reference to party. I think, therefore, it was an unfair and an unfortunate allusion and statement for that distinguished Senator, and one for which he will not succeed in holding the Democratic party responsible.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at the figures. Ninety-five million dollars is the excess of appropriation during the present Administration as compared with the four preceding years. During the Garfield and Arthur administrations, from 1882 to 1885, the total amount—I will not read by years, but I will give the total amount for the four years—was $291,667,306.68 for pensions.

Mr. GEORGE. What four years was that?

Mr. GORMAN. During the four years of the Garfield and Arthur administration.

During the four years of President Cleveland's administration, embracing 1886, 1887, 1888, and 1889, the Mexican war pensions and the deficiency in pensions, including the appropriations now made for 1889, we have appropriated $304,486,400, or an increase of $12,819,093.32, not quite so large as the Senator in his statement yesterday made it. But there is an increase of over $12,000,000, nearly $13,000,000, and a gross amount in four years of Democratic rule of $304,486,400.

The details are shown by this table:

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PENSIONS 1882-'85, 1886-'89.

Garfield and Arthur's administration:
1882	$68,282,306.68
1883	100,000,000.00
Deficiency	16,000,000.00
1884	86,575,000.00
1885	20,810,000.00
Total	291,667,306.68
Cleveland's administration:
1886	60,000,000.00
1887	76,075,200.00
1888	76,252,500.00
Mexican	6,900,000.00
Deficiency	3,500,000.00
1889	81,758,700.00
Total	304,486,400.00
	291,667,306.68
Increase under Cleveland's administration	12,819,093.32

Now, I say to the Senator from Iowa that but for the President's vetoes and the Democratic opposition the amount would have been swelled at least $25,000,000 per annum for the next five or six years; and I do not believe the loyal men of the North, the soldiers who were engaged in the Army during the rebellion—for they are patriotic men—or their descendants, desire or wish that this Government shall be bankrupted by going on with the ratio of increase which we have made in the last four years. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa and I know that there is a class of men who are engaged in the collection of these claims. This city is full of them, men of intelligence and activity, men of wealth—for they have made millions upon millions in the collections of these claims—who subsidize the press, who own newspapers, who get up excitement between the two political parties so far as they can use the means thus made from the soldiers to promote this feeling.

I say to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Maine that it is too grave a question, the amount involved is too great to treat this matter simply from the political standpoint. We ought to come together and determine what is to be done to limit these appropriations and yet do justice to all who have not been included, rather than fight it out upon party lines.

Mr. President, in this ninety-five millions of appropriations in excess of the Arthur administration there are some other items which can not be charged to the Democratic Administration. When this Administration came into power it found the country without a single gun of high power and without a vessel that could go to sea with safety. You were without a Navy; you were without a gun in any fortification of the country, except some obsolete affairs whose day had passed, and we all agreed, Republicans and Democrats alike, that this was a crying shame and must be remedied, and in the appropriations made you have appropriated for the Navy alone during Mr. Cleveland's Administration the sum of $77,271,483.29 as against an appropriation of only $60,260,921.17 in the previous four years, or an increase of $17,010,562.12 to build the Navy.

The appropriations for the Navy during the Garfield and Arthur administrations and the present Administration are as follows:

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE NAVY, 1882-'85, 1886-'89.

Garfield and Arthur's administration:
1882	$14,566,037.55
1883	14,819,976.80
1884	15,894,434.23
1885	14,980,472.59
Total	60,260,921.17
Cleveland's administration:
1886	15,070,837.95
1887	16,489,907.20
1888	25,767,348.19
1889	19,943,389.95
Total	77,271,483.29
	60,260,921,17
Increase during Cleveland's administration	17,010,562.12

You not only have made this increase upon a matter that both parties have agreed to, but the principal amount of these appropriations was put in by this body. You increased them, and it was right to increase them; but it is wrong for the Senator from Iowa, after having been the principal agent, and his party in this Senate being responsible for the increase, now to hold the Democratic party accountable for the extravagance committed by this body of which he is the leader. Every dollar of the appropriations was exactly right, and in view of recent occurrences, and those likely to come, the appropriations were not made too soon. The amount might have been doubled with great profit and security to your country, for, Mr. President, the people of the United States in the matter of the armament of your forts and the construction of your Navy and other public works, the necessity for which all recognize, are not parsimonious as to the amount of appropriations. It is with them only a question of how the money shall be expended and the honesty of the administrative officers who disburse it. We can point with great satisfaction not only as Democrats but as Americans to the wonderful result that has been attained since President Cleveland has administered the executive affairs of this Government. I am not going now into the details as to what his administration has accomplished, but it will compare favorably with any administration from the foundation of the Government to the present, and there is no administration since the close of the war that begins to compare with it in results.

Mr. President, the next piece of extravagance that is included in the remarks of my friends from Iowa and Maine is the postal service. I have listened on former occasions on this floor to gentlemen who have denounced the Post-Office Department, since the advent of the Democratic Administration, for not giving postal facilities; and yet it appears by the record that to-day that Department is carried on upon a more extensive scale than ever in the history of the Government. The extensions of the star routes and all the facilities for the quick dispatch of mails and the extensions over the Territories have gone on with a rapidity that is astonishing. As to the details there may have been some causes of just complaint, as there always are, but during the administration of Garfield and Arthur there were $179,131,252 expended, and during the past four years we have expended $224,621,737.14, or an increase of $45,490,485.14 in the postal service alone, to give the people of this country that which they must have and will have under any administration, perfect mail facilities. To do this we have spent $45,490,485.14 more than was expended during the administration of Garfield and Arthur. And you call it extravagance!

The appropriations for the postal service during the administration of Garfield and Arthur and during the present Administration have been as follows:

APPROPRIATIONS FOR POSTAL SERVICE, 1882-'85, 1886-'89.

Garfield and Arthur's administration:
1882	$40,957,432.00
1883	44,643,900.00
1884	44,489,520.00
1885	49,040,400.00
Total	179,131,252.00
Cleveland's administration:
1886	53,700,990.00
1887	54,365,863.25
1888	55,694,650.15
1889	60,860,233.74
Total	224,621,737.14
	179,131,252.00
Increase in postal service during Cleveland's administration	45,490,485.14

All of this money, or nearly the whole of it, comes back, as the Senator from Iowa knows, in postage; but just before this Administration came in—I think it was immediately before—the postage was reduced from 3 to 2 cents on every letter, so that the receipts from the Post-Office Department nominally fell off, but the people of the country gained forty or fifty millions by that reduction, and but for that reduction the postal receipts would have been about a sixth greater than they are, and there would have been, instead of a deficit in this matter, a large surplus for the Treasury; but in that item is $45,000,000 more than were expended in the four years previous to the advent of the present Administration.

Mr. President, there was another item which was for the benefit of the North—and I class Maryland for the time as a Northern State, as distinguished from States that were out of the Union during the war—that goes to swell up this $95,000,000, every dollar of which went to New England, Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland, and States upon the border north of us and east of us. That is $5,769,015.28 for the Alabama claims, all paid since this Administration came in, and charged to us as a part of the extravagance in the $95,000,000. Then there was the Choctaw Indian judgment of $2,858,798.62, with interest. This was a judgment of the courts. The claim came along before the Democratic party became responsible for this Government, but it is to be paid out now. It is not fair to charge that to this Administration as part of its extravagance.

UNUSUAL ITEMS OF APPROPRIATION DURING CLEVELAND'S ADMINISTRATION.

Alabama claims awards, 1887	$5,769,015.28
Choctaw Indian judgment, 1889	2,858,798.62
Total	8,627,813.90

Mr. President, the whole recapitulation of the increase of appropriations during Mr. Cleveland's administration, for pensions and the other items which I have gone over, makes $83,947,954.48 of the $95,000,000, which my friend from Iowa talks so much about.

RECAPITULATION.

Increase in appropriations during Cleveland's administration, for pensions	$12,819,093.32
Increase in appropriations during Cleveland's administration, on account of the Navy	17,010,562.12
Increase in appropriations during Cleveland's administration, on account of the postal service	45,490,485.14
Unusual appropriations during Cleveland's administration—Alabama claims awards and Choctaw Indian judgment	8,627,813.90

Mr. President, I do not desire even to follow the Senator from Iowa in the matter of giving this matter the slightest partisan tinge. The appropriation bills have come to us from another branch, but the abundant increases that have been made upon them have been made in this body, and as I have said, they were made, in my judgment, the greater portion of them, in the interest of the country and for items for which you could not avoid making appropriations. Still we have largely increased the bills as they came from the other branch of Congress, and we are responsible for it in the Senate. What I complain of now is that the Senator from Iowa (and I joined him heartily in nearly every measure) should bring this matter up at this last moment, when we are about to pass the bills and make them laws, and do it for a partisan purpose, do it that it may be used in the campaign to defeat the Democratic party, when he and his party upon this floor are responsible for the increases to the extent of millions.

Now let us see what the increases are.

INCREASE MADE BY THE SENATE ON APPROPRIATION BILLS AS PASSED BY THE HOUSE AT THIS SESSION.

Agricultural bill (law)	$124,150.00
Army bill (as passed Senate)	6,892,500.00
Diplomatic and consular bill (law)	$14,600.00
District of Columbia bill (law)	520,609.00
Legislative, etc., bill (law)	142,702.97
River and harbor bill (law)	2,494,833.77
Sundry civil bill (as passed Senate)	5,174,593.24
Deficiency bills	799,643.22
Total	16,163,632.20

It is fair to say that the Army bill and the fortification bill are yet in an incomplete state, and to some extent these figures may be changed, but up to date we have increased the appropriations as they reached this body from the House of Representatives $16,163,632.20.

Mr. President, I repeat again that in nearly every instance I think the increase was right, and many of the items were added, as the Senator from Iowa has stated, at the solicitation of the heads of Departments; and I emphasize it that in making these appropriations the majority of the Senate, though opposed to the Administration, have acted with a liberality which will be a proper thing for minorities to follow and for us to follow, if our positions should happen at any time to be reversed. Your action in the committee was the result of this policy, but it is, I think, an unfair advantage which the two Senators who have spoken and who are members of the Appropriations Committee are attempting to take of the Democratic party. They ought to have sunk the partisan in the statesman.

This is not all the Senate has done in the way of increasing appropriations during this Administration. Ninety-five millions more, says my friend from Iowa, were appropriated during the Democratic Administration than during the last Republican Administration. During all that time you have had possession of the Senate, and the increases proposed by the Senate on appropriation bills as they have passed Congress from 1886 to 1889 have been $73,507,916.91. They are as follows:

INCREASE PROPOSED BY THE SENATE ON APPROPRIATIONS AS THEY PASSED THE HOUSE DURING THE FOUR YEARS 1886 to 1889.

1887	13,392,795.82
1888	35,046,210.61
1889	14,977,103.32
Total	73,507,916.91

NOTE.—The amount stated for 1886 does not include the river and harbor bill as it passed the House and failed in the Senate for want of time to consider it.

If the appropriations had been made as proposed by the Senate their sum total for the past four years would have been $52,861,105.23 greater than it is.

APPROPRIATIONS INCREASED BY THE SENATE'S ACTION FOR THE FOUR YEARS 1886 TO 1889, OVER THE AMOUNT PASSED BY THE HOUSE.

1888	3,934,419.58
1889	9,351,595.55
Total	20,646,811.68

NOTE.—The amount stated for 1889 does not include the proposed increase on the Army bill and only the difference on the sundry civil bill as it would stand should the pending conference report be adopted.

Mr. President, we come now to the general result of all the appropriations during the administrations of Garfield and Arthur and of President Cleveland. The net ordinary expenses of the Government and the total expenditures during the Arthur administration were $769,761,316. The average per capita of expenditure during that administration on all the people of the United States was $4.62, taking the tables of the late Professor Elliott as to the population of the United States. When you ran the Government during the last Republican administration you had it costing the people $4.62 per capita, and when your administration closed and President Cleveland was inaugurated March 4, 1885, as I have before stated, you had not a gun of high power in the United States, you had not a vessel that could float the ocean with safety, and you were absolutely at the mercy of any fifth-rate power of the world. We came into power, and by the action that has been heretofore taken, which I will not go over again, we have conducted this Government, and will up to the end of the next fiscal year, making the four years complete, at a cost of $778,340,119.60, or an average per capita of $4.32, basing the population of the country to-day, I think, 2,000,000 below what it is; but basing the population only at 61,688,000, which is simply adding to Professor Elliott's tables the same ratio of increase, we have conducted the Government and accomplished all these great things that I have alluded to by holding to a rigid accountability every officer, high and low, introducing economies everywhere, cutting down salaries, as was shown by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is being done on the legislative bill, a million dollars below General Arthur's administration.

Mr. ALLISON. Does my friend say that there has been any cutting down of salaries? The reduction suggested by the Senator from Kentucky yesterday resulted simply from the dropping of one hundred and fifty pension clerks, who were carried during the last year of President Arthur's administration and who were not needed during the following year.

Mr. GORMAN. We have reduced the amount of the expenditures. I know there has been an adjustment of clerks, a clerk dropped off here and there, but with the force now in the Pension Office we have been able to grant more pensions than were ever granted before in the history of the world. There is a third more work being accomplished in the Pension Office under the earnest and skillful management of General Black than in any like preceding period, and the work of every auditor's office in the Treasury Department is up to date under the present Administration, which was never done heretofore, and yet we have had a reduction of expenditures that amounts to a million dollars. With all of that, and all the things we have accomplished, and notwithstanding there is $95,000,000 of increase that my friend from Iowa harps upon, we have conducted the Government at the rate of $4.32 per capita, or 30 cents less than the party of my friend from the State of Iowa has done. It seems to me that this is a result of which every party man may be proud and at which every American ought to rejoice. So much for the figures.

Period.	Net ordinary expenditures.	Estimated population.	Payments per capita of population.
Arthur's administration:
1883	$265,408,137.54	54,163,000	$4.90
1884	244,126,244.33	55,554,000	4.39
1885	260,226,935.11	57,093,000	4.56
Total expenditures	769,761,316.98		13.85
Average per capita expenditure per annum			4.62
Cleveland's administration:
1886	242,483,138.50	58,420,000	4.15
1887	267,932,179.97	60,018,000	4.47
1888	267,924,801.13	61,668,000	4.34
Total expenditures	778,340,119.60		12.96
Average per capita expenditure per annum			4.32

NOTE.—The population as stated in the above is from estimates prepared by the late Professor E. B. Elliott, of the Treasury Department, except for the year 1888, which is computed on the same ratio of increase as is shown for 1887 over 1886.

Now, sir, we come to the matter of appropriations for public buildings, and I again repeat that I regret exceedingly——

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator understand that the American people are to be governed at so much a head? Does he think that is any fair test of the relative expenditure under different administrations? We hire a school-teacher and pay him $50 a month whether he has twenty-five pupils or thirty or fifty.

Mr. GORMAN. No, Mr. President; but the expenses of this Government increase as the population increases. You can not make appropriations for rivers and harbors and the ordinary affairs of the Government the same for 10,000,000 people that you can for 60,000,000. The expenses increase in the ratio that the population increases, and it is the only fair way to state this case; to compare a Democratic administration that so ably manages the affairs of 62,000,000 of people in point of economy with one when there was but 10,000,000 people would be a most unfair statement, and therefore I think the last table I have read is the exact statement to be made.

Now, Mr. President, as to the appropriations for public buildings and the allusion that an excessive amount was appropriated for the Southern States or the Democratic States. I hold in my hand a report made at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, being Senate Report No. 89, made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, from which I have taken the figures and brought them together. I find that that report is a statement of the appropriations for public buildings made from March 4, 1789, to March 4, 1885, inclusive. During that whole period, taking the Southern States, eliminating Kentucky and Missouri, but taking all the remainder of the Southern States, twelve in number, the whole amount from 1789 to 1885 for that entire section of the country was $16,329,328.46—I will publish this statement, giving the appropriations for each State—whereas the appropriations for Connecticut, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Vermont, the New England States, six of them as against twelve Southern States, amounted to $13,053,718.73, and for the five Middle States, including Delaware and Maryland, $29,663,231, making, if you add Kentucky and Missouri to the Southern States, for all the fourteen Southern States $25,306,689.99. Take the six New England States, $13,053,718.73, and the five Middle States, $29,663,231; the ten Western States, $22,882,695.89; the three Pacific States, $2,964,184.81; and for the Territories, $621,493.90, making the aggregate amount from the foundation of the Government up to 1885 $94,492,014.32.

If you deduct the fourteen Southern States—and it is not fair to include Missouri and Kentucky, for I understand that one building alone, during the time when the Democrats were not responsible for appropriations, in Missouri, in the city of St. Louis, cost $6,000,000—but including them and counting all of these Southern States out of the $94,492,014.32, the Southern States have only received $25,306,689.99, and the Northern and Western States $69,185,324.33. Here are the figures:

Mr. President, since this Administration came in—for the statement I have read runs down only to 1885—I hold in my hand a table showing the amount of appropriations, which I will have published, by States, but I will not detain the Senate by reading it. The summary of it is that the fourteen Southern States which I have named, including Kentucky and Missouri, have received during this Administration by appropriations $2,747,000, while the Western, the Middle, and the Eastern States have had $4,043,148.

New public buildings authorized since March 4, 1885, to be erected under the control of the office of the Supervising Architect, Treasury Department, arranged alphabetically by States, August 29, 1888.

I submit to my friend from Iowa, as the figures show, and they can not be controverted, that from the very beginning of the Government to 1885 the per cent. taken upon population or territory shows a great excess of appropriations to the Northern States in all these appropriations. Since this Administration came into power the Northern and Western States, by appropriations of Congress and by the approval of the President of the United States, have received nearly $5,000,000 as against $2,500,000 in round numbers received by the fourteen Southern States; and when he takes into consideration that for four years that last-named portion of the country was devastated and business went down, and there was suffering and oppression such as no other people were ever subjected to upon the face of the earth, and when he remembers that within the past four years and since the election of a Democratic President this sectional feeling has been to a large extent wiped out and become a thing of the past; that Northern men, capitalists from all sections of the country, have been flowing into the Southern States and developing the mines of Alabama, of Georgia, and of North Carolina and Virginia, and have gone into the Everglades of Florida and made garden spots of places that were marshes but a few years since; that this prosperity extends from here to the utmost confines of the Republic south of us, and an era of good feeling under a Democratic administration prevails, and it is only remarkable, controlling, as the Democratic party does, the executive branch and the other House, that they have been so moderate; and I think it ill becomes the Senator from Iowa and myself, who represent in part great communities not seriously disturbed by the affairs of twenty years ago, whose people are prosperous and have always been so, who have been treated generously by this Government from the beginning—indeed, his State has received as generous treatment as any State in the Union, whether under Democratic or under Republican rule—to now take advantage of what he and his Republican colleagues and those of us on this side as Democrats have done to advance the interests of this country, and it is a degree of partisanship which I trust my friend from Iowa will regret and never repeat.

Mr. President, there is a serious prospect presented by the figures of the Senator from Iowa. It is that the estimated revenues for the current year are $440,563,734.32. The current and annual appropriations will probably be $424,000,000, leaving an estimated surplus of $16,563,734.32. Four hundred and twenty-four millions to run the Government!

There is but one way to reduce these enormous appropriations. There is but one safe road to greater economy, and that is to reduce taxation. Stop the unnecessary flow of the people's money into the Treasury. An overflowing Treasury induces extravagance. It invites schemes for public plunder. I trust before we adjourn the one certain remedy, a reduction of taxation, will be consummated.

[Mr. GEORGE addressed the Senate. His speech complete will be found in the proceedings of the succeeding day.]

Having spoken for some time——

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to yield to me for a few moments that I may ask the Senate to take a vote on the conference report which is under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I now move that the Senate still further insist upon the remaining amendments, and request a further conference thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments not disposed of by the conference report, and request a further conference with the House of Representatives.

Mr. VANCE. I ask if it would be in order to object to one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order to recede from any amendment made by the Senate. A motion to do so would take precedence.

Mr. VANCE. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 222.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Amendment numbered 222, page 76, line 7: Strike out all after the word "been" down to and including the word "and" in line 12, as follows:

Commenced upon a sworn complaint setting forth the facts constituting the offense and alleging them to be within the personal knowledge of the affiant, or upon sworn complaint by a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue or revenue agent, setting forth the facts upon information and belief and.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House of Representatives having disagreed to this amendment, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] moves that the Senate recede from the same.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will not press that motion at this time.

Mr. VANCE. I do not know what other time may be offered in which I might press it if I desired the amendment to be non-concurred in. It seems to me, Mr. President, that "now is the accepted time" [laughter], and if the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will not harden his heart, I think I can show a reason very briefly why the Senate should recede from that amendment.

In the country from which I come there are a very large number of small distilleries, the whole output of which put together would not perhaps make as much spirits as that of one large distillery in the country of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. There is a degree of annoyance perpetrated under the internal-revenue system by the methods of enforcing that law which, however much we might be inclined to stand if it were required of us as good citizens, we should yet like to have removed, if we may, by asking the Senate to recede from this amendment. In addition to the authority which is given to the regular collectors of internal revenue and their deputies and to the special agents of the Treasury Department, the law as at present constituted permits any officious or greedy outsider or informer to swear out warrants "on information and belief" to prosecute his neighbor. It is very often done for the sake of the fees alone. Hundreds of the most frivolous cases of prosecution upon the most insufficient grounds are thus inflicted upon the people of my country and, I doubt not, of other countries in the same way.

Now, the proposition is to deprive the greedy informers of the right to swear out warrants and to commence prosecutions at their discretion for the sake of the fees or for the sake of avenging any private complaint they may have against their neighbors. In all ages and in all countries, I believe, an informer has been held in disrepute and condemnation as the meanest of all characters, and it does not become a free government to offer any inducement to this class of persons. There is nothing more repugnant to the spirit of Anglo-Saxon liberty than the employment and encouragement of informers. There is nothing more undemocratic, there is certainly nothing more un-American, than the employment of the basest class of any community to aid in the execution of its laws.

It is a remnant of the methods of despotism left over in the ostensible service of freedom, and it is an acknowledgment that the brutal and unscrupulous methods of tyranny may be justified in the service of free government. Such things, sir, are uncomplimentary alike to the Government and to the people by whom they are employed. It is bad enough in all conscience to give the known and recognized and bonded officers of the law the authority to institute these prosecutions on information and belief merely, but to allow every class of greedy sneaks in the land, who desire to persecute their neighbor or to make the miserable fees that attend the prosecutions in the Federal courts—to allow them to institute prosecutions upon their information and belief is, it seems to me, a direct blow to everything that we hold reputable and free in our Government.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are those laws in his State enforced by the Democrats of his own State in the manner that he is now indicating?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir; I am speaking of outsiders. I am speaking of persons who are permitted under the present law to volunteer information and make affidavits for the sake of the fees.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do they flock into North Carolina in such numbers as to cause any serious disturbance to the honest, law-abiding citizens of that State? Do they arrest any persons who are not guilty of crime?

Mr. VANCE. Hundreds of them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do they arrest persons not guilty of violations of the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. VANCE. Hundreds of them, sir, hundreds of them. If the Senator will analyze the present law as it stands on the statute-book he will find that anybody has the power, on information and belief, to have anybody else arrested.

Mr. COCKRELL. And they are taken before a United States commissioner.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, and then if the prosecution is dismissed as false or frivolous the witness' fees, etc., are pocketed by these informers, whilst a great loss is inflicted on their victims.

Mr. COCKRELL. Who are these informers? Are they not residents of North Carolina?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly, they are our own people, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Informing on each other?

Mr. VANCE. Informing on each other, as a matter of course. Nobody else could do it—nobody but those that live there could pretend to any knowledge of the matter. I should like the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator to inform me why this extraordinary power or privilege should be given to any malignantly disposed person in any community to take out a warrant in the name of the United States, and have any person brought before a United States commissioner on a pretense of crime, whether it was well-founded or ill-founded, for the sake of the fee, and that is just what is done to my personal knowledge frequently in the State where I live, and I have no doubt it is practiced in all the States where there are any small distilleries or any temptation to such a practice.

I think the original text of the bill as it came from the House, confining this power to the resident and bonded officers of the Government who may, and whose duty it is to, take out warrants upon information and belief, is proper; but if any outside person sees proper to begin a prosecution against any one of his neighbors, he should be required to swear his warrant out upon his own personal knowledge and not upon information and belief. That is the whole of the proposition. It seems to me that it is a reasonable one, and I hope the Senate will recede from its amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Just one word with respect to this amendment. The provision in the House bill enlarges very much the existing law as respects exemption from prosecution in regard to the little distillery cases so numerous in the State of North Carolina. The Committee on Appropriations struck out a portion of that clause, but I think left enough of it to protect the Senator's friends from any unjust prosecutions. I will just read the clause as amended to show how the law will stand if the Senate amendment is agreed to.

> And no part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any fees to United States commissioners, marshals, or clerks for any warrant issued or arrest made, or other fees in prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws, unless the prosecution has been approved, either before or after such arrest, by the attorney of the United States in the district where the offense is alleged to have been committed, etc.

Now surely, Mr. President, that ought to be protection enough to any honest man, because a man who is fit to be district attorney in North Carolina, or in any of the Southern States, certainly will not allow the fees unless he has just ground for prosecution. The Senate Committee on Appropriations, in looking over this matter with great care, believed that they had gone as far as it was wise to go on this matter. So I hope the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina will not be agreed to.

I will say to that Senator, further, that there are two bills pending, which if either one of them should pass would greatly relieve his constituents. One of them is a bill pending in the Committee on the Judiciary which gives practical relief, and the other is the Mills bill, of which we have heard so much, which absolutely relieves these people from every sort of restraint respecting little distillations in those small distilleries. So there are two measures pending which can be considered hereafter if this should prove objectionable.

Mr. VANCE. That is very true, Mr. President, those two bills are pending and they are very likely to "pend" [laughter], and while they are pending they are of no use to my constituents or anybody else.

Mr. ALLISON. So it seems.

Mr. VANCE. In reference to the statement that the bill as it is at present requires the district attorney to supervise the warrants of arrest, that is also true; and we have two very faithful and efficient officers as district attorneys in the State of North Carolina, but I beg to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are two districts in North Carolina, the eastern and western districts.

There are ninety-eight counties in the State. The western district, in which grain and fruit are raised, and in which most of the distillation is done, is composed of sixty counties, it being hundreds of miles from one end of the district to the other, so that it is a physical impossibility for the district attorney to supervise the issuance of all the warrants in his district. If he could do it, why that would be all the protection our people would require against superfluous prosecutions, but it is a physical impossibility. When a warrant should be required to be issued in a county 90 miles or 100 miles distant from the home of the district attorney, the proposed prosecutor and the witnesses would have to make a journey of that distance to submit to the district attorney the facts in the case before he could give an intelligent opinion in regard to it. So that it makes it, owing to the vast extent of territory, a physical impossibility, as I have said.

And now, Mr. President, it does seem to me a small matter that the zeal on behalf of informers of the Committee on Appropriations every time that any relief of this kind is proposed against the harshness of the law of which we complain in the South should go to such an extent and be so diligent to defeat every mitigating measure. We only ask for a common right—that no citizen shall be taken up and exposed to costs, pains, and penalties, and to inconveniences of a criminal prosecution, except upon sworn information and knowledge of the facts. That is all.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that the Senator from North Carolina has a remedy by securing good officers to administer the law in his State, and if they oppress good Christian people as he suggests that they are now doing, I think a proper appeal to the President of the United States would perhaps cure that difficulty. It is very certain that all this legislation has a tendency and effect to relax the collection of the tax on whisky, and the Committee on Appropriations have gone just as far on this provision as they could possibly go and secure the enforcement of the law. I hope the Senator's motion will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 222.

A division being called for, there were—ayes 15, noes 13; not a quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If his colleague can tell me how he would vote I shall be obliged.

Mr. TELLER. I doubt whether my colleague would care to be paired on this subject. I do not know how he would vote or anything about it. It is thought perhaps the Senator had better not vote.

Mr. CALL. I vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when Mr. FAULKNER'S name was called). I beg to give notice that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but being persuaded that if he were present he would vote "nay," I record my vote that way.

Mr. TELLER (when Mr. MCPHERSON'S name was called). The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paid with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. VANCE (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLODGETT (after having voted in the affirmative). Since casting my vote it occurs to me that I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The result——

Mr. MANDERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] to the fact that as no quorum has voted it may be well for us to transfer pairs. I will transfer the pair of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. WALTHALL. I have already voted. I am paired on political questions, but do not regard this as a political question.

Mr. MANDERSON. I did not understand that the Senator had voted. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. BLODGETT. In order to make a quorum, if agreeable to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], the colleague of the Senator with whom I am paired [Mr. CHANDLER], I will vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Coke,	Payne,	Walthall,
Berry,	George,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Blodgett,	Gray,	Reagan,
Brown,	Hampton,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vance,

NAYS—22.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Stewart,
Allison,	Frye,	Manderson,	Stockbridge,
Blair,	Gorman,	Palmer,	Teller,
Chace,	Hale,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Sawyer,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Sherman,

ABSENT—37.

Beck,	Edmunds,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Evarts,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Butler,	Farwell,	Morgan,	Stanford,
Cameron,	Faulkner,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Chandler,	Gibson,	Paddock,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Hearst,	Pasco,	Voorhees.
Daniel,	Hiscock,	Plumb,
Davis,	Hoar,	Quay,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,

So the motion to recede was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] which, as the Chair understands, includes the asking of a further conference.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. SHERMAN to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations the message of the President of the United States of August 23, 1888, relative to the fishing rights of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, as I desire to leave the Chamber for the remainder of the evening, I wish to say that I should like to be recognized when this subject comes up again, after the Senator from Mississippi has concluded his remarks.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the conference report for the presentation of which I yielded the floor for the time has been disposed of, I shall proceed now by unanimous consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is entitled to the floor on the motion to refer the message.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall not detain the Senate more than a few moments now, and, if agreeable, I should prefer finishing what I have to say, which will not be very long, in the morning. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one or two things before I take my seat this evening.

Mr. GEORGE proceeded with his speech begun this morning. After speaking some time he said:

Now, Mr. President, I have been interrupted for some time, and with the consent of the Senate I will close my remarks for to-day here and give notice that to-morrow morning I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to finish them, and shall occupy but a short time.

[Mr. GEORGE'S speech will be found complete in the succeeding day's proceedings.]

WAGON-ROAD TO PIKE'S PEAK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. TELLER. I ask unanimous consent that that order may be informally laid aside and that I may have general consent to call up Senate bill 3482, being Order of Business No. 2175.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside and that the Senate take up the consideration of the bill the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 2175, being the bill (S. 3482) to enable parties to construct, maintain, and operate a wagon-road to the top of Pike's Peak, in the State of Colorado.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that any corporation or association duly authorized by the laws of Colorado may construct, maintain, and operate a wagon-road into or across the Pike's Peak military reservation, Colorado, but the Government of the United States shall have the right to use the road free from toll or tax.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to correct the title of the bill so as to read, "A bill to authorize the construction and operation of a wagon-road across the Pike's Peak reservation, in the State of Colorado."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

BAPTIST FEMALE COLLEGE, LEXINGTON, MO.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 2156, being the bill (H. R. 2601) for the relief of the Baptist Female College, of Lexington, Mo.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for the payment to the Baptist Female College, of Lexington, Mo., of $3,167.67, compensation for rent of the college building while used by the United States Army for four years from 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TACOMA PUBLIC PARK.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 2174, being the bill (S. 3475) granting the use of certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma, for the purposes of a public park.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMER SAGINAW.

Mr. GRAY. I move to take from the Calendar Senate bill No. 3364, Calendar number 2023.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be reported by the Clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 3364) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw, of New York.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Commissioner of Navigation to cause the foreign-built steamer Benison, owned at New York, by W. P. Clyde, an American citizen, and rebuilt by him in the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States under the name of Saginaw, and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to authorize and direct the inspection of the vessel and cause to be granted the proper and usual certificate issued to steam-vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that the steam-boiler, etc., were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN D. ADAMS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business No. 1944, being the bill (S. 320) for the relief of John D. Adams.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 3, after the word "thousand" to strike out "six" and insert "seven;" and after the word "and" to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "five;" in line 4, after the word "and," to strike out "eighty-five" and insert "thirty-six;" and in line 9, after "1861," to strike out—

It being the sum found due him under contract, as per statement of the Sixth Auditor of the Post-Office Department, dated February 18, A. D. 1880—

So as to make the bill read:

That the sum of $3,750.36 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay John D. Adams, a contractor for transporting the United States mails in the State of Arkansas prior and up to the 1st day of June, A. D. 1861.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask a question in reference to this bill before it is passed. Does the bill come from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. Is it unanimously reported?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Yes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS TO ARMY NURSES.

Mr. BLAIR. I would like to ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr.

COCKRELL] if it would be inconvenient for him to proceed now to the consideration of the bill for the relief of women enrolled as army nurses?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I made inquiries of the Department in order to get some facts which I considered necessary in the consideration of that bill, in regard to the number and the localities of those persons, and the War Department sent me a telegram the other day in reply to my letter, in which they say that the Surgeon-General's Office is making out a list and will furnish it at the very earliest day possible. I have not received that yet, and I hope therefore the Senator will not press the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say to the Senator and to the War Department, upon which I called some four months ago when this matter came up, that there seems to be a dexterity of delay which is quite formidable certainly to the army nurses. Life is short, time is passing away, and these nurses are growing old. I hope the Department will be able to comply with the Senator's request very soon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope so, too.

Mr. BLAIR. Otherwise the Senator, I hope, will join with me in having the bill taken up without the communication from the War Department.

REVENUE-CUTTER FOR NEW BERNE.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 1946.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1946, being the bill (H. R. 5670) for the construction of a revenue-cutter for New Berne, N. C., to replace the revenue-cutter Stevens.

No objection being made, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIRE-ALARM AND TELEPHONE SERVICE.

Mr. VANCE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to transmit to the Senate for its information the recent annual report of Henry R. Miles, superintendent of the fire-alarm and telephone service, for the year 1888, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 30, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FITCH, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. MCKINLEY, indefinitely, on account of serious illness of his wife.

To Mr. DARGAN, for six days.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask leave of absence from Monday next for my colleague, Mr. STOCKDALE, who is called home on important business.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 165) for the relief of H. C. Markham;

A bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin;

A bill (H. R. 3902) for the relief of Sophia B. Moore;

A bill (H. R. 6371) granting a pension to Jesse M. Stillwell;

A bill (H. R. 7013) to place the name of Delia Newman on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 8087) for the relief of Thomas Strodder;

A bill (S. 1880) declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875;

A bill (S. 3474) amendatory of an act authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., approved February 3, 1887;

A bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States;

A bill (S. 3076) granting a pension to Mary M. Shattuck;

A bill (S. 2899) granting a pension to Harriet Welch;

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution to provide for the expenses of the Government. I will state that all the appropriation bills have passed except the sundry civil and Army appropriation bills, and it becomes necessary to extend the expenses under these bills until the 15th of September.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1888, entitled a 'Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government,'" approved July 31, 1888, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect to and including the 15th day of September, 1888.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHEADLE. I object.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, and Mr. RYAN. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. CANNON. I was going to say to my colleague on the committee that I think the gentleman from Indiana will not object when he understands the object of this resolution. Unless this resolution pass it leaves the Army and Navy without provision for their pay.

Mr. FORNEY. It does not leave the Navy without pay, but it does leave the Army; without this is passed we can not pay the soldiers nor those in the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes, the Navy bill is passed, but there are a great many sundry expenses in the sundry civil bill, which is not passed, that it is absolutely necessary there should be provision made for. I think that it is a pity we should be called upon to pass this resolution because these appropriation bills ought long ago to have been passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to say, as far as the Army bill is concerned, that I have very strong hopes that it will be finally passed to-day, so that in respect to the Army bill I do not see any particular reason for it, but there are necessary expenses under the sundry civil bill for which it ought to be passed.

Mr. FORNEY (to Mr. TOWNSHEND). Your Army bill could not get to the President in time to make provision for the necessary expenditures under that bill.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The Chair will state, however, that if this is a report from the Committee on Appropriations it is in order and will go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and can be considered there. It is not in order for present consideration if there be objection, and the gentleman from Indiana objects. It will therefore go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

The committees were called, but no reports were presented.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, if that motion is carried, will the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department have an hour to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. If this motion is agreed to, and the committee rise, and no motion is made and agreed to thereafter to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of appropriation bills or general revenue bills, the hour for the consideration of bills will be occupied to-day after the committee rises.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire to ask a question for information. After this resolution is disposed of, will it not be in order to have the morning hour for the consideration of bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just stated that even if the motion be agreed to to go into Committee of the Whole, after the committee rises, unless some other motion is made having precedence over it under the rule, the consideration hour will be in order.

The motion of Mr. FORNEY was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. FORNEY. I call up House joint resolution 219.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1888, entitled a 'Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government,'" approved July 31, 1888, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect to and including the 15th day of September, 1888.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the committee now rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. FORNEY, and the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 111, noes 3.

Mr. CHEADLE. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will designate to act as tellers the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE].

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to waste the valuable time of this House, but I raised the point of no quorum for this reason: This is the first time in the history of our Government when any Congress has ever been in session as long as this one has been and has failed to make the necessary appropriations to conduct the several departments of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of no quorum?

Mr. CHEADLE. I wish to make a statement.

Mr. FORNEY. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to make his statement.

Mr. CHEADLE. One hundred and thirty-eight members of this House have petitioned for the consideration of legislation which directly affects the men who saved this Government. Their petition has not even been considered. Ten days of valuable time was lately taken up in the consideration of claims which are almost a century old, claims which have been favorably recommended by forty-four reports from committees of Congress, and after that time had been consumed in the consideration of those claims they were ruled out upon a point of order. I say, Mr. Chairman, to you, to this House, and to the country, that there is no justification for the present condition of the appropriation bills, and I want to emphasize that fact. There is no reason why those bills should not have been passed months ago. The second month of the new fiscal year is almost ended, and yet the regular appropriation bills are not disposed of. It was for the purpose of calling attention to these facts that I raised the point of "no quorum," and I now withdraw it.

The motion of Mr. FORNEY that the committee rise and report the joint resolution favorably to the House was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration the joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenses of the Government," and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees begins at thirty minutes after 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art. Pending this motion, I ask that debate in Committee of the Whole on this bill and amendments thereto be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. I object to that.

Mr. WHEELER. What time do you want?

Mr. ROGERS. I want the bill considered in its regular order.

Mr. WHEELER. There is only one hour more for its consideration.

Mr. ROGERS. It does not make any difference whether there is one hour or forty. I want it considered in its regular order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WHEELER that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. MCCREARY in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art.

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] ten minutes.

Mr. HEARD. I do not expect to consume ten minutes; but I do not propose to be limited absolutely by the friends of this bill, nor to be put in such a position that I may be cut off arbitrarily.

Mr. BAYNE. This is an important matter and I think we ought to have order in the House.

A MEMBER. You can not get it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, in order that I may not appear in a false attitude before the committee, I desire to explain my position. I am not here to antagonize this bill unreasonably; but I would like to know, before I consent to be limited to any particular time, that the opponents of the bill, if the course of discussion should develop any opposition, are to have a fair proportion of the time which is to be devoted to this discussion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask whether the hour rule does not apply to the discussion of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being considered under the hour rule.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then the gentleman has the floor for an hour.

Mr. HEARD. I shall not consume an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has the floor, and has yielded ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD].

Mr. HEARD. I will ask whether the gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor. When the committee rose yesterday I had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Missouri at that time had not the floor in his own right, but was on the floor through the courtesy of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEARD. No, sir; I was on the floor, as I understood, in my own right; but if it is insisted by the gentleman from Alabama that I was on the floor by his courtesy, I do not intend to abuse that courtesy. I want the House, however, to understand that if it is expected that the consideration of this bill shall be completed to-day there must be a fair apportionment of time between those who favor and those who oppose it, if anybody desires to oppose it.

Mr. WHEELER. We are willing to give you all the time you desire.

Mr. FARQUHAR. There will not be any trouble about that.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, until this bill was presented to the House yesterday, and when the gentleman from Alabama asked that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation for its passage, I had not had opportunity to give the measure the attention which its importance demands. Since that time I have given it such examination as has been within my power, and I desire to submit very briefly my views and to state the reasons which prompt me to oppose some of the features of the bill which are certainly objectionable.

Mr. Chairman, the committee from which this bill has been reported—a committee for which I have very great respect, both on account of its personnel and by reason of the amount of work which it appears to have done—seems to have examined extendedly, if not exhaustively, the question whether or not the Government can be sufficiently protected by the character of work now being done by mechanical means, or to put it plainly, by steam-presses as against hand-press work. In view of the fact that these gentlemen of the committee appear to have conscientiously and intelligently examined this subject, I am disposed to defer to their judgment in this regard, and to yield whatever opinions I might have had in antagonism to the views which they have submitted, for the reason that I think they have had better opportunities for examining the question than I have had, and that therefore their opinion is entitled to greater weight.

I am ready to concede, sir, that in a matter of such importance to the American people as the printing of the currency of the country, whether it be the silver certificates or the national-bank notes, it is a matter of the most vital concern that the work should be properly done, so much so in fact as not to permit the question of cost, if confined within reasonable limits, to enter into the consideration of the subject at all.

The Government of the United States reserves to itself the exclusive right and power to print all the certificates and notes which it issues to do service as a circulating medium for the people; and no private corporation or individual can issue paper obligations of its own, or his own, to serve for such purpose without being subject to the tax of 10 per cent. provided in the law—which is therefore practically prohibitory; hence it is not only important to the people, but the imperative duty of the Government to see that the work done in the production of such certificates and notes be of the very best quality, in order that it may be enduring, as well as for the proper protection of the same against counterfeiting; and from the examination which I have been able to make of the evidence taken by the committee and presented in their report accompanying this bill, I agree with them in the conclusion that the hand-press work is unquestionably superior to that done by the steam-presses, and that it is therefore the duty of the Government to discard the use of the steam-presses for this character of work.

I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, to discuss here the point as to whether or not the printing of the internal-revenue stamps is sufficiently well done on the steam-presses, or whether hand-work shall be exclusively employed there. I am inclined to think from my own examination of the matter that it is sufficiently well done now, but I do not wish to make any issue with the committee on that point. Substantially, therefore, I stand with the committee in its recommendations so far as the discarding of the steam-presses is concerned, in the management of that bureau, and adopting exclusively hand-work for such character of work as that specified, and the importance of which makes it improper to permit the question of cost to control, because it should be done in the highest style of art.

I proceed, therefore, to discuss another feature of the bill which, to my mind, is particularly objectionable, and which in its effect, if that be not its direct object, will be, if enacted into law, oppressive in regard to an official of the Government, who, if I understand the public impression in regard to him, is both conscientious and competent. I invite attention, therefore, to the second section of the bill, and give notice that at the proper time I shall move to strike it out. It provides as follows:

SEC. 2. That hereafter the Chief and Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing shall be either practical engravers or plate printers.

Now the fact is, as has been developed by inquiry, and is admitted by the friends of the bill, that neither the present Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, nor his assistant, is a practical engraver or plate-printer. This bill, therefore, if enacted into a law will throw these gentlemen out of their present positions, which must then be filled by the appointment of some other men, and no matter how deficient they may be in the higher order of administrative ability necessary for the discharge of the duties of the important positions they would be required to fill, the only standard of their fitness for the places as applied by this bill, is a knowledge of one or the other of two branches of work, which are but the merest items of detail in the general management of that important bureau.

Mr. SENEY. Does the gentleman commend the chief of the bureau for his action in regard to retentions and appointments there?

Mr. HEARD. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to be diverted from the line of remarks which I have sought to pursue, to the question of the merits or demerits of the chief of the bureau as relating to appointments. I am not here to defend the chief of that bureau, except upon the record of his work, but to prevent the enactment of a law which limits the Secretary of the Treasury, in the selection of a man to fill that important position, to members of any particular trade or calling, or tie his hands in regard to a matter in which he is primarily responsible to the people of the country for the result of his action, and for the character of service rendered by his appointee.

Mr. SENEY. Would it not be a little more satisfactory if he was a good Democrat?

Mr. HEARD. It might be a little more satisfactory to the gentleman from Ohio and to myself if a man possessing the necessary qualifications to discharge the duties of that position should be appointed there who was a Democrat, if the present incumbent is not. I do not know whether the present incumbent is a Democrat or not, and for the purposes of this argument I do not care. It is not a matter of consequence to me. He is selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is a Democrat, to discharge the duties of this office; and so far as this House is advised by the report accompanying this bill, or so far as it has been enlightened by any information given to the House by the three gentlemen who have spoken in favor of the bill, and so far as we have been able to get any information from the reports of his official superiors or even from the partisan press of the country, he stands before the House and before the country as a competent and conscientious official. I know that the Democrats, of which I am one, in this House and in the country have taken pride in the achievements of this official as a part of our administration, in the reduction of expenses and the accomplishment of his work, as we claim, at a reduction of about half a million of dollars in the last three years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I now yield——

Mr. HEARD. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. HEARD. No; five.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well.

Mr. SENEY. Will the gentleman tell us in that time, if he pleases, when speaking in justification of the head of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, why it is that he keeps Republicans in office and will not let Democrats in?

Mr. HEARD. I will leave the gentleman from Ohio to make that investigation and inquiry for himself and in his own time. I shall not waste the brief time I have in considering it. I repeat, I have no defense to make of the political management of the chief of this department in his discrimination in favor of Republicans as against Democrats, if he has made any such discriminations. If I knew that he did that, other things being equal between the parties on their merits, I should vote to "bounce" him. [Laughter.]

I would say also, in order that I may be perfectly understood, that I would vote to bounce him if I thought that he lacked fidelity to duty—that higher qualification to conduct the office which he holds—in such degree that he would retain an inefficient Democrat in his office, even if it was necessary to fill his place, if removed, with a competent Republican. The work conducted in this bureau is of too high an order and of too much importance to the people of this country to have it made a mere political machine in favor of the incompetents of any party, or to have it run upon a partisan basis in defense of the rights and in disregard of the interests of the people of the entire country. As a Democrat I prefer to see Democrats fill the offices of the country under a Democratic administration; but as to the selection of workmen to do the mechanical work in that bureau, I am willing to trust to the action of this official under the supervision of his official superior, the Secretary of the Treasury, a Democrat who, I am satisfied, would not permit unjust discrimination against Democrats.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to ask you if you would then bounce him in this indirect way?

Mr. HEARD. If I found he discriminated unjustly against Democrats in his bureau, I would bounce him and try to find a competent Democrat to fill the place.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But you would not do it in this cowardly way?

Mr. HEARD. No; it would not be necessary or to my taste. The power that appointed him, however, can remove him if cause for such removal appear, and I feel content to leave that duty to the Secretary of the Treasury, in perfect confidence that he will sufficiently consider the rights of his party friends, while he will also protect the public interests committed to his charge. But I do not care to say anything more on that subject, and I now ask the serious consideration of the House to a more important feature of the bill under discussion.

There are 914 persons actually employed in the bureau at this time. This number comprises engravers of various kinds, such as portrait, scrip, letter, and vignette engravers, transferrers, hardeners, plate-printers and their assistants, perforators, numberers, binders, typographic printers and pressmen, machinists, carpenters, plumbers, engineers, ink-makers, book-keepers, clerks, and a variety of miscellaneous occupations. If the proposition of the advocates of this bill, that the chief of the bureau must be able to determine of his own knowledge the faults in the work of every one of the subordinates, and be able to point out the best remedy, is true, then a plate-printer or an engraver has but a very small part of the information necessary to fulfill the requirement.

The chief of the bureau is charged with the management of the business of this immense concern. It is his duty to see that its force of employés is properly adjusted to the work required of the bureau; that the facilities for the execution of this work are adequate, and that the interests of the Government are fully protected in all the details of the business, involving an expenditure of nearly $1,000,000 a year. This requires an officer of great administrative ability, and it would be folly of the worst kind to limit the selection of an officer for the place to two callings in life. The Secretary of the Treasury has now the power to select from the whole field, including engravers and plate-printers, and it would be a restriction upon the power to select and appoint to limit it as proposed in this bill.

Mr. FORAN. Is not that the requirement in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. HEARD. I am not prepared to deny that such provision exists in the law as applied to the Government Printing Office, or to admit that if it does so exist that it would necessarily follow that it would therefore be wise to apply the same rule to this bureau, in which, as I understand, there is a much greater diversity of employments among the employés. I am not disputing the wisdom of requiring that the Public Printer should have a practical knowledge of that particular kind of work which he is to superintend. I suppose he should.

Mr. FORAN. That goes without saying.

Mr. HEARD. But, Mr. Chairman, I object to the argument of the committee that this man should necessarily be a plate-printer or an engraver because he should possess personal knowledge of this work, for that presupposes, in order to make this argument effective, that he must personally inspect every piece of work issued from the bureau. That would be impossible. The Postmaster-General might as well be required to examine personally every postage stamp going through his Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BURNES. I would not be betrayed into this debate but for the fact that it has been my duty as a member of the Committee on Appropriations to make rather a careful investigation of some of the subjects involved in this bill. I desire simply to call the attention of the committee to two propositions. First, the work done on the steam-presses is undoubtedly inferior work, and when done it is more readily counterfeited than the work done on the hand-presses by the skilled men in that branch of the public service. In proof of the proposition I refer to the Government Counterfeit Detector—official organ of the Treasury Department—where you find page after page devoted to exposures of new counterfeits of the silver certificates of every denomination and bank-notes of denominations of one dollar up to one thousand dollars. In this document, which I hold in my hand, are almost endless proofs that counterfeiting has become almost universal throughout the country, and that our people—especially those who handle but little money and are not familiar with the qualities of paper money—are suffering on every hand.

The skilled banker and the skilled men who handle great sums of money are not suffering in consequence of this class of work so much, perhaps, as the people who deal in small sums of money, and take it often without thought or power of self-protection. The working people and the poor people of the country are being imposed upon by these counterfeits which are now overflowing the country. For that reason I think it is right to discard, as far as can be possibly done, the use of the steam-presses and to resort to the old time-honored hand-press, which gives American skill an opportunity to present to the country a sound circulating medium, and gives brains an opportunity to combat inanimate machinery for the safety and protection of sixty millions of free people. Besides, it will make the safety of our paper money issues no longer a contest between the machine and the criminal work of counterfeiters, but it will be a contest between intelligent skill and honest labor against the machine and criminal work of villains, in which the former will triumph, counterfeiting will become a lost art, and the increased skill of our workmen will be a pride of the Republic.

One other proposition. I have nothing to say as to the second section of the pending bill. I know nothing of the qualifications of the present incumbent, and it is not my business to know. I know something of the good judgment of the President, and am quite content to trust him to make appointments and removals, and determine who is fit or unfit to be the Superintendent of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. But I support this bill because the use of these steam-presses, under all the circumstances, is little less than an outrage. I do not care whether such use is a saving or a loss to the Government. It is enough for me that the work done by them is unsafe and more easily counterfeited, but above all the terms and conditions on which they are used are utterly abhorrent to every sense of justice, as I see it.

There is plenty of sworn testimony taken and printed as to which is the better of the disputed modes of doing the work.

There is scarcely a question as to the superior work of the hand-presses. And it is not certain that the work thereon costs any more than when done by steam. But if it cost double as much as the latter, I would not hesitate a moment to drive these steam-presses (patented) out of the service of the Government, because of the extortion, the unreasonable demand of the patentees of such steam-presses. Let us consider it. These steam-presses are patented; and the proprietor of the patent charges the Government $500 for the privilege of building each of these machines. Then the Government is required to take the patterns from the patentee, and for the use of these patterns, $400 additional are paid; and the patterns must be returned immediately after the completion of each machine; so that this $400 additional, expended upon every machine, goes of course into the pockets of the patentee. Now there are $900 paid on each machine, or rather for the right to build it. The Government with $900 paid for the privilege builds the machine at a cost of $1,250. Now, mark you, that machine for the building of which the Government pays $1,250 (and which does not then become the property of the Government), has cost the Government $900 for the privilege of building. The extortion fails to stop there. After the machine is completed at the expense of the Government, the Government pays to the patentees a royalty of $1 a thousand for all the impressions that the machine makes. Upon a careful calculation we find that the patentee gets $1,700—it may be a little more or a little less—every year for a machine which costs $1,250 to build. Whether under this system we save a little money or not makes but little difference to me. I would not stand such an extortion if the revenues of the Government were made thereby ten times what they are.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GEAR. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question: What is the capacity of these presses?

Mr. BURNES. From 3,000 to 4,000 impressions a day.

Mr. GEAR. What proportion of the bills or notes struck on these presses are damaged?

Mr. BURNES. The testimony differs as to that; but it is undoubtedly a fact that the spoilage of paper—expensive paper, too—is a larger expense in the use of steam-presses than in the use of hand-presses.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended occupying any time in the discussion of this measure, but inquiries having been propounded I will reply by stating that the Committee on Expenditures of the Treasury Department have given the bill most careful and painstaking consideration. The committee was confronted with the fact that the greatest country on earth had by its laws assumed exclusive control of its entire circulating medium. Section 3412 of the Revised Statutes reads:

Every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association shall pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the amount of notes of any person, or of any State bank, or State banking association, used for circulation and paid out by them.

Section 3413 reads:

Every national banking association, State bank, or banker, or association, shall pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the amount of any town, city, or municipal corporation, paid out by them.

Sections 3414, 3415, and 3416 provide regulations and penalties for the violation of this law, and section 3417 provides that the provisions for bank tax and returns shall not apply to national banks, but as the national-bank currency is issued by the Government it follows that the 10 per cent. proviso amounts practically to an absolute inhibition against the issuance of currency from any source other than the United States.

Having undertaken to supply 65,000,000 of people with such currency as is necessary to their commercial interest, amounting as it now does to nearly $1,000,000,000, it certainly devolves upon the law-making power to see to it that the currency thus (as it were) forced upon the people should be such as to give all possible protection to citizens against the spurious paper of the counterfeiters which may be imposed upon them. The Government employs men of experience and skill, whose special training, constant practice, and thorough familiarity with the subject renders it comparatively easy for them to detect counterfeit money immediately upon its presentation. But the great body of the people are not familiar with the niceties and technicalities of engraving and printing, and to protect them is one of the highest duties of sovereignty.

Certainly it will not be questioned by any one that the assumption by our Government of the exclusive and supreme control in issuing the money of the country involves and carries with it the reciprocal obligation on the part of the Government to at least to the fullest possible extent give protection to the people against the loss which must fall upon the citizen who accepts a counterfeit national-bank or United States note.

HOW TO PROTECT THE PEOPLE.

Experience has shown that the best way to protect the citizen is to execute the currency in such a high style of art as to make the difference in the appearance of genuine and spurious notes apparent to the ordinary civilian. The judgment of those who have had most experience is that to accomplish this purpose the Government should employ the highest style of art in engraving and printing its securities, bonds, notes, etc.

The New York Stock Exchange is composed of men who have had more experience than any others in dealing in and handling bonds and securities of all kinds, and this distinguished body found it necessary for their own protection to adopt stringent regulations, a few paragraphs of which I will read:

It is required that a sample of each issue of stock or bonds shall be shown to the committee (to be left with the committee, if possible) so that it may be ascertained whether proper precautions have been taken against forgery; and no form of stock certificate or bond will be accepted unless it has been carefully engraved by some responsible bank-note engraving company whose work is admitted by the exchange.

The face of every bond, coupon, or certificate of stock must be printed from steel plates which have been engraved in the best manner, with such varieties of work as will afford the greatest security against counterfeiting by hand.

For each document or instrument there must be at least two steel plates, namely, a tint plate, from which will be printed an anti-photographic color so arranged as to underlie important portions of the face printing, and a face plate containing the vignettes and lettering of the descriptive or promissory portion of the document to be printed in black or in black mixed with a color.

These two printings must be so made upon the paper that the combined effect of the whole, if photographed, would be a confused mass of lines and forms to effectually secure against counterfeiting by scientific processes. All signatures upon securities must be written. Stamped signatures will not be accepted by the committee.

It will thus be seen that these experienced gentlemen in guarding themselves against forgeries and counterfeiters deemed it essential that the printing should be done—

From steel plates which have been engraved in the best manner, with such varieties of work as will afford the greatest security against counterfeiting by hand.

The committee were informed that the meaning intended is that the printing should be done by hand; that is to say, substantially as is provided in this bill.

I also find that the New York Legislature at its recent regular session was so impressed with the importance of this subject that it adopted a resolution which I will read:

Whereas, to prevent counterfeiting, error, and fraud, it is necessary that all issue of bonds, notes, stamps, and securities of the Government should be executed in the highest mode of excellence:

Resolved, That all Government securities, such as bonds, notes, stamps, checks, etc., should be executed in the highest attainable grade and perfection of the arts of engraving and printing, for the security of the Government and the people against error, fraud, and counterfeiting, and that the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress be, and they hereby are, requested to use their utmost endeavors to secure legislation to that end.

I also am informed that the Legislature of New Jersey adopted the same or a similar resolution.

INFERIORITY OF STEAM-PLATE PRINTING ESTABLISHED.

It has been asserted upon this floor that the bills printed by steam-presses are equal to the best plate-printing from hand-roller presses.

The observations of the committee have led them to a very different, and I may say to quite a contrary conclusion, and in this conclusion they are abundantly sustained by the evidence.

Mr. Graves, who is certainly an ardent advocate of steam-press printing, in his evidence before the Committee on Banking and Currency, says:

The finest work, such as fine ruled lines, vignettes, finely-engraved portraits, and all work of that character, can only be done successfully on a hand-press.

I can not pretend to give all of Mr. Graves's evidence or by any means any considerable portion of the voluminous evidence of the other witnesses, most of which was given before the Committee on Banking and Currency, but will call attention to some expressions from witnesses which I recall and which tend to show the superiority of hand over steam printing.

David Russell, who stated he had been engaged in printing bank notes for twenty-two years, testified:

Q. Do you mean to say that hand-engraved work can be printed better by hand-press than it can be by machine-press?
A. Undoubtedly.
Q. What is your opinion as to the facility for counterfeiting notes? Can a note of the highest style of art be as easily counterfeited as a note of a lower style of art?
A. Certainly not.
Q. Can a note that has the highest style of art on the face and back be as easily counterfeited as a note that has the highest style of art on one side and not on the other?
A. Certainly not.

Arthur Small, a plate-printer who has been employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing since 1864, gave the following evidence:

Q. From your comparative observation as a steam-press printer and a hand-press printer, can you state your opinion as to which press does the better work?
A. I haven't any hesitation in saying that the hand-press does decidedly the best work.

John E. Breitmayer, a plate-printer of twenty-four years' experience, who has been engaged in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing since 1868, testified as follows:

Q. Have you not been selected as an examiner when tests of steam-press printing were made, to pass on the excellence of work? Were you not selected as an expert by the head of the bureau?
A. Yes, sir; twice.
Q. You have had opportunities of comparing the relative excellence of steam and hand-press printing?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Give the committee your best judgment on the matter as to which is the more excellent?
A. I say by all means the hand-press; not because I am personally interested.

Charles Neal testified:

Q. How long have you been at work for the Government?
A. About twenty-seven years.
Q. Will you go on and state to the committee what are the advantages or disadvantages of the steam-press over the hand-press?
A. In the first place, you can not use as good ink on a steam-press as you can on a hand-press.
Q. Taking into account the increased wastage of paper, the inferior character of the ink which, as you testify, must necessarily be used, the wear upon the plates, and the character of the work produced upon the steam-presses with reference to its artistic merit, do you deem it judicious or a matter of economy to make use of steam-presses in printing Government securities or currency?
A. I do not.
Q. If the wastage is increased in any marked degree, state whether or not in your judgment it is an indication that the whole character of the work has been lowered.
A. That is my opinion. I think the work turned out now is the worst work ever issued by the Government.

By Mr. GRAVES:

Q. In what respect do you think it is the worst?
A. In the general appearance of it.
Q. To what classes of work do you refer?
A. I refer to the notes.
Q. The national-bank notes?
A. No; I don't have anything to do with them.
Q. The United States notes?
A. The United States notes and silver certificates.
Q. In what respect are they inferior; in engraving or printing?
A. In the printing and paper.
Q. Does that apply to the face printing or the back printing?
A. Both.

Thomas H. Little testified:

Q. From your experience in running a hand-press and a steam-press, state which produces the best work.
A. The hand-press.
Q. Why?
A. Because there is brains used and the man has command of his material, and to a certain extent he can regulate the way in which he works his paper. If it is too wet he can work it a little dry. He can fill his plate in better and take off more ink with a hand-rag, and can polish his plate better; leave it full with the hand and polish it, or wipe it close, as the demands of the engraving require.

Edward Shaffer appeared before the committee, and was interrogated as follows:

Q. State from your experience and observation which does the better work, the hand or the steam press.
A. From what I have seen and from what I know of the hand-press I will say that the hand-press does the very best steel-plate printing that can be done. Remember, I say that can be done. It does the very best. If properly done it can not be improved on by any process which they have. The steam-press does not do the very best work.

Ward Morgan, one of the superintendents in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, appeared before the committee and was interrogated as follows:

Q. I believe you have already said that the highest work of art in printing can only be secured from hand-printing?
A. I said the finest work, such as fine ruled lines, vignettes, finely engraved portraits, and all work of that character, can only be done successfully on a hand-press.

MUST PROTECT AGAINST COUNTERFEITERS.

During the last two months the attention of the public has been called to notices in the public press of an unusual number of dangerous counterfeits. The committee in its anxiety to learn of what bearing, if any, the method of engraving now used by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing had upon this matter, addressed several letters to John S. Bell, chief of the Secret Service division, Treasury Department. In his reply, Mr. Bell said:

UNITED STATES TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
SECRET SERVICE DIVISION, OFFICE OF CHIEF,
Washington, D. C., July 25, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your several communications relating to the subject now before your committee, i. e., the printing of the obligations and securities of the Government in the highest style of art, reached me during my absence from the city.

You request to have my views upon the subject, especially with reference to the method of printing most likely to afford security against the art of the counterfeiter. I am not an expert, and therefore can not speak as intelligently upon the subject as I would like to; but I believe that the methods of printing, numbering, sealing, and issuing of the securities of the United States ought to be adopted which will approach the nearest to being absolutely secure against error and fraud, even if such methods should be much more expensive than others having less guaranties of protection.

In my judgment the printing can be best done, and in a higher state of art, when done by hand than that which is printed by the steam-press.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN S. BELL, Chief.

Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER,
Chairman.

The committee therefore requested Mr. Bell, and the former chief of the bureau, Mr. James S. Brooks, to appear before them.

Their evidence is printed in full in the report of the committee. It clearly shows that in their opinion the hand-press produces work very superior to that done by the steam-press.

In his voluminous evidence Mr. Brooks said:

Q. Do I understand you to express an opinion that notes printed by hand in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are a better guaranty of safety to the public than those printed by steam-press?

Mr. BROOKS. Everything else being equal, I think it is more of a guaranty than the steam-press, but there are other things to be considered, and this I wish to go down. I was going to say this—that, in my judgment, if you print both sides by hand from plates you now have, without depth, in my judgment, there is a very serious defect as compared with former issues. If we print both sides by hand unless you had better paper and deeper engraved plates, we would have similar trouble to that we have with the new series.

Mr. Bell also gave evidence at great length, from which I read the following paragraph:

The CHAIRMAN. You are of opinion that the present style of printing of all of our securities that are printed with steam plate presses can be easier counterfeited and the counterfeits are more difficult to detect?

Mr. BELL. I would like to say in answer to that, that the Government, with sixty millions of people and $140,000,000 of surplus, a rich Government, ought not to use inferior means of work to make Government obligations. They ought to use the best paper that can be made, and they ought to have it engraved in the highest style of the art, and from my knowledge, and from seeing bills that have been printed by steam methods of printing and by hand, there is no question at all, to my mind, that every bill should be printed by hand. I do not think they can get the depth of printing on a bill by steam, not in any of those I have seen. When a person that can sit 10 feet away and discover the difference between those printed by hand and those printed by steam, as I did awhile ago, I think there is quite a difference in the bills in regard to printing. Some of the gentlemen in charge of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing might hear my statement and perhaps make one of their best kind of steam bills and a poor kind by hand, and ask me to show the difference. In that case, I want to have the privilege of going to the bureau, in the printing division, and getting one of them as they usually come out.

Mr. Bell explained at some length his recent investigations regarding counterfeiting in Detroit, New York City, and Pittsburgh to illustrate the inferior character of the bills recently produced. He said:

We have a man in our service named Daniel McSweeney, who is stationed at Pittsburgh, Pa., who has had eight or nine years' experience, and is a very careful man. Some four months ago Mr. McSweeney learned that there was some counterfeit money passed in his district. He called at the banks, and threw out genuine five-dollar silver certificates as counterfeit. So it was printed in the newspapers all over the country, and especially at Washington, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Cincinnati, saying the country was flooded with counterfeit money. Some time afterwards he sent three of these bills in to me to determine whether they were genuine or not. I immediately pronounced them genuine, and telegraphed him so.

This shows that some of the recent issues are so inferior that a man in the secret service who had eight or nine years' experience pronounced them to be counterfeits.

It is quite true that many of these witnesses qualified their statements, and many of them insisted that steam-press printing was good enough for all practical purposes; and some of the witnesses attributed the inferior issues to the inferior paper quite as much as to the machine-presses.

The great weight of the evidence submitted and of the opinions expressed to the committee overwhelmingly establish the proposition that the work done on the steam-press is not so good as that done on the hand-press, and the only ground upon which it is sought to justify the continued use of the inferior process is merely that the best printing is only obtainable at an increased cost.

QUESTION OF ECONOMY.

There has been much controversy as to the economy of using steam-presses.

The Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing shows an average saving of about 18 per cent., and it is alleged that this advantage has been partly gained by ignoring some elements of cost which should have been charged against the work turned out by the steam-presses.

In estimating the relative cost it must be remembered that the Government pays, first, $500 for the construction of each press; second, $400 for the cost of patterns for each size (and it is alleged that the contract stipulates for the return of the patterns after the press is constructed); third, $1,250 which is paid by the Government for the construction of each press; fourth, a royalty of $1 is paid for every one thousand impressions.

On this question of the relative cost of steam and hand work we can get some information from the report of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General of 1885. It appears that advertisements were made for bids to print postage-stamps for the year 1886. In the blank form of proposals furnished to bidders they were invited to bid upon five different classes of work.

The specifications in these five different classes were as I will read:

Class No. 1: Price per thousand for stamps printed on hand-roller presses. Marked No. 1 in accompanying specifications.

Class No. 2: Price per thousand for stamps printed on steam-power presses, with part hand-work. Marked No. 2 in accompanying specifications.

Class No. 3: Price per thousand for stamps printed wholly by steam-power. Marked No. 3 in accompanying specifications.

Class No. 4: Price per thousand for stamps printed by steam-power presses which require a portion of the work, such as wiping and polishing, to be done by hand, with the right reserved to the Postmaster-General to require the work to be done on hand-roller presses. Marked No. 4 in accompanying specifications.

Class No. 5: Price per thousand for stamps printed by presses upon which all the work is done by steam-power, with the right reserved to the Postmaster-General to require the work to be done on hand-roller presses. Marked No. 5 in accompanying specifications.

The report of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General then goes on to say:

Upon opening the proposals, at the time appointed for the purpose, it was found that three bidders had competed for the contract, namely: The Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, and the Franklin and American Bank Note Companies, both of New York. The bid of the Secretary of the Treasury, under class No. 1 (for printing on hand-roller presses), amounted to $132,545.49; under class No. 2 (for printing partly by steam and partly by hand) to $114,136.39; and under class 4 (for same kind of printing as in No. 2, with the right reserved to the Postmaster-General to require the work to be done on hand-roller presses) to $132,545.49, being the same amount as the bid under class No. 1.

It will I suppose be admitted that the bid by the Secretary of the Treasury was made under the advice of the Superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, or at least that the Secretary relied upon the judgment and experience of that official, and this bid shows that the then Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was thoroughly of the opinion that the postage-stamps executed by the steam-presses would not be satisfactory to the Department, and therefore that the successful bidder would be required to do the work by hand-press. This result was so apparent to those who prepared the bid for the Treasury Department that the bid of the Secretary of the Treasury was $132,545.49 for stamps printed on hand-roller presses, and the bid was precisely the same, namely, $132,545.49, for the same work done on steam-presses, with the right reserved by the Department to require that the work be done by hand-roller presses, provided it should appear that the stamps executed by steam-presses were not satisfactory.

This, I think, may be taken as an admission that one having the option to choose between work done on a hand-press and that done on a steam-press, with power, backed by a contract, to enforce his choice, would be expected to reject work done on a steam-press and only accept that done on a hand-press.

But even if it were clearly established that there would be a saving to the Government by the use of steam-presses, and even admitting that the saving would be equal or even exceed the amount insisted upon by Mr. Graves, there remains the increased expense of maintaining the Secret Service division of the Treasury Department, which must be incurred so long as the obligations and securities of the Government can be readily and successfully imitated, an expenditure which can be reduced so soon as the Government shall be able to print its securities or obligations in so perfect a manner as to make it impossible to counterfeit them. And when this degree of excellence in printing our notes and securities shall be reached there will be the further saving of the expense attending the prosecution of captured counterfeiters.

SECURITY THE PARAMOUNT QUESTION.

I can not agree, however, that the question of economy merits any such consideration in this connection as is contended by the advocates of steam-press printing. Ill-judged economy is sometimes criminal extravagance. It seems to me that in considering this bill Congress should keep in view that it is the paramount duty of the Government to afford the citizen the greatest attainable security against losses by counterfeit notes being imposed upon him, and it being quite evident, I might say almost undisputed, that this security can be obtained in a greater degree by using the hand-roller presses exclusively, I therefore think this House will not hesitate to give this bill their candid support.

PROMINENT BANKER'S OPINION.

A prominent banker addressed a letter to Mr. Bell, an extract from which I will read:

* * * I read in the New York Times yesterday a criticism of your testimony before the committee of Congress investigating the engraving of the currency. I have been for twenty-five or thirty years in banking life, and much of that time engaged in handling bills as a teller, and it struck me that your testimony and that of Mr. Brooks was pertinent and correct, and in accord with the general opinion among banks as to the inferior value of the present issue of silver certificates in the matter of engraving and paper. These notes are issued to circulate among the general public, who are not experts, and should be so designed as to make an imitation of them obvious to even the uninitiated, and their true value as a medium is in proportion to the difficulty of successfully passing their counterfeits upon the public. These plates seem to be designed for heavy and strong effects, such as are customary in modern lithographs, rather than the delicate hand steel work of former times. In the latter the least impression in a counterfeit destroyed the symmetry and harmony of the note and attracted attention at once.

In this issue the eye is caught and retained by the bold and striking points, and imperfections escape observation, consequently a fair imitation has a good chance of passing with those not expert.

The paper seems to be too soft and thick, and does not wear well, and the engraving seems to break down upon it much earlier than in former issues.

Both the paper and engraving of this issue were condemned by many banking experts when they were first issued as not suited to the purpose, and I think your opinions and those of Mr. Brooks as expressed to the committee will be generally indorsed by banks and those who understand what is necessary to protect the public, and whose years of experience have shown them the best means of doing so. I thought it might interest you to know this, otherwise I should not have intruded upon your valuable time. * * *

I think this voluntary expression of a banker who has handled money for thirty years is well worth our consideration.

I have in my hand a book containing an immense number of notices cut from papers during the present month giving accounts of the existence and uttering of large amounts of counterfeit money, and the arrest of a number of counterfeiters. I can not allude to them all but I will call your attention to an editorial in the last copy of the "American Banker and Financial Examiner" of August 25, 1888, which I will read:

We recently saw a counterfeit $5 silver certificate and were surprised at the excellence of its execution. The points of difference between it and the legitimate certificate are so infinitesimal that they must surely escape the observation of ordinary people. The counterfeiter has done his work so well that we are constrained to admit that his accomplishment is a work of art and that he himself is a person of no mean ability. It will soon be a question (if he continues to improve) as to whether the engraver employed by the Government is indeed the more accomplished artist.

And right here we pause to reflect whether in its pathetic striving after economy, the Administration might not save more money by taking this distinguished criminal into its employ. He might be induced to accept a position which would place his talents upon a basis of legitimacy, for a very small competency, seeing that such a position would relieve his artistic activities from legal interference. Thus the exalted mediocrity which appears to have taken possession of the Engraving and Printing Department might be returned to the statesman who dragged it from its native obscurity, or it might be quietly dropped into the Potomac; and we are sure that either procedure would be acceptable to that good-natured fellow, the American people. But yet it is fearfully possible that this obscure artist is making more money by his admirable productions than an economical Government might care to pay for his services. Is it too much to request a patriotic and well-fed Congress to quit filibustering and appropriate funds for advertising for this able engraver and beg him to come to terms? The currency is endangered because the Administration imagines it saves 11 per cent. on the cost of the work as now produced. If this is economy, pray let us have a period of extravagance by all means.

In conclusion, I will state that this Administration is quite alive to the importance of the question which is now arresting our attention, and I feel justified in stating that the Administration and the officials of the Government (excepting perhaps one or two subordinates) are anxious for a speedy remedy of the evil which is becoming apparent. The inferior execution of Government securities was not inaugurated by this Administration. It commenced before it came into power, and it is as solicitous as any of us for such legislation as is necessary to enable the officials to make the changes. We have only to do our duty and enact the bill into a law and you can rely upon it the evil of which we complain will receive prompt correction at the hands of the Administration.

As I understand, the main objection to this bill rests on the second section. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this section be struck out.

Mr. HEARD. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. WHEELER. In order to avoid any further discussion on that part of the bill, I ask unanimous consent that the second section be struck out.

Mr. CARUTH. I object.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I move to amend by striking out the second section.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILKINS. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I opposed this bill; but now that the second section has been struck out, all my objections to the bill have vanished, and I am quite willing it shall pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendments reported by the committee. The first amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4 strike out the word "check" and insert "and internal revenue."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "and drafts."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCCREARY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it be passed as amended.

Mr. WHEELER. I move the previous question upon the amendments and the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER. On account of this bill being under consideration when we adjourned, the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department has had no opportunity to present other bills for consideration, and I now ask unanimous consent that Saturday next be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from that committee.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman indicate the character of the bills which he desires to present for consideration?

Mr. WHEELER. One is the bill to grant leave of absence to per diem employés in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is good.

Mr. WHEELER. Another one is a bill providing for a new division of "balances" in the Treasury Department, a matter which has been recommended by the Treasurer. I believe those are all the bills that I shall call up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]?

Mr. PAYSON. Unless the request can be modified so that a portion of the time can be devoted to the consideration of bills relating to general pension legislation, I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that this consideration hour may now be considered as having expired, if no other committee desires to call up a bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The regular order is the continuation of the call of committees for the consideration of bills under the rule. The call rests with the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

MEDICAL DIVISION, PENSION BUREAU.

Mr. WASHINGTON (when the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department was called). I call up the bill (H. R. 1548) to increase the efficiency of the medical division of the Pension Bureau.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the medical staff of the Pension Office shall consist of one medical referee, one assistant medical referee, three surgeons, and twenty-four medical examiners.

SEC. 2. That the medical referee shall be a man of pre-eminent professional ability, and shall receive the sum of $4,000 annually. He shall be the chief of the medical division, and as such shall oversee and arrange the work of said division.

SEC. 3. That the assistant medical referee shall also be of pre-eminent professional ability, and shall receive an annual salary of $3,600.

SEC. 4. That the three surgeons shall be experts in their profession, and shall receive each an annual salary of $3,000.

SEC. 5. That the medical examiners shall be surgeons of education, skill, and experience, and shall receive each an annual salary of $2,500.

SEC. 6. That all former acts or portions of acts conflicting with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take immediate effect.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether that is not a bill which should be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is on the House Calendar, but the Chair thinks it ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it evidently involves an expenditure of public money.

Mr. ROGERS. I make the point that the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I make the point in order that I may have an opportunity to examine the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, this bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. WASHINGTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, having had under consideration House bill No. 1548, beg leave to report the same for favorable action, with the following amendments, to wit:

"Amend line 4, section 1, by inserting the word 'qualified;' so as to read 'three qualified surgeons.'

"Amend section 2, line 2, by striking out the words 'four thousand' and inserting 'three thousand six hundred.'

"Amend section 3, line 3, by striking out the words 'and six hundred;' so as to read 'salary of three thousand dollars.'

"Amend section 4, line 1, by inserting the word 'qualified;' so as to read 'three qualified surgeons.'

"Amend section 4, lines 2 and 3, by striking out 'three thousand' and inserting the words 'twenty-five hundred.'

"Amend section 5, line 3, by striking out the words 'and five hundred;' so as make it to read as follows: 'An annual salary of two thousand dollars.'"

This bill proposes to increase the medical board of the Pension Department by the addition of one qualified surgeon and six medical examiners in addition to those already employed, and to increase the salaries of all.

These officers and their salaries consist at present of—

1 medical referee, annual salary	$3,000
1 assistant medical referee, annual salary	2,250
2 qualified surgeons, each at $2,000	4,000
18 medical examiners, each at $1,800	32,400
22 officers, whose combined salaries make	41,650

Under the bill as it is proposed to be amended these officers and their salaries will be as follows:

1 medical referee, annual salary	$3,600;	increase...	$600
1 assistant medical referee, annual salary	3,000;	increase...	750
3 qualified surgeons (each $2,500)	7,500;	increase...	3,500
24 medical examiners (each $2,000)	48,000;	increase...	15,600
29 officers, whose combined salaries make	62,100;	increase...	20,450

—increasing the number of medical officers seven and the combined salaries of all (including the additional force) to the amount of $20,450 per annum.

This proposed increase in force is requested by the Commissioner of Pensions and by the medical referee. The latter states, "It is our opinion that this increase in the number of qualified surgeons and medical examiners as proposed in this bill should be provided, as the present force is inadequate for the discharge of the duties pertaining to these positions." The rolls of the Department show that nineteen clerks are now detailed to assist in the work of this medical corps, so great is the press of work, and should this bill become a law only a part of these clerks could be sent back to the desks at which they properly belong. As to the proposed increase in salaries the Department says:

"We have no hesitation in suggesting that it is our judgment that the salaries attached to the positions of qualified surgeons and medical examiners are inadequate, as has been demonstrated by the fact that several of the gentlemen occupying such places have resigned, and assigned as their reason for severing their connection with the bureau that they were not sufficiently remunerated for the character of services they were called upon to perform, and that professional experts in other departments are better remunerated than medical examiners in the Pension Bureau."

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentlemen have paid attention to the report which has just been read, because it in a great measure explains this bill. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], and was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and I personally, in connection with other members of that committee, made a thorough examination into this subject, which convinced us that the medical board of referees as it now exists in the Pension Bureau is not adequate to the performance of the duties assigned to it within the proper time. The board is now very much behind with the work, and a small addition to the force is desirable. We propose only an addition of one qualified surgeon and six medical examiners, and we give to each a small increase of salary in order that the best talent may be secured.

There is at present one chief medical referee, whose salary is $3,000. To fill that position a man is required of the highest medical and surgical skill and intelligence, and any gentleman who is familiar with the earnings of first-class surgeons in any city knows that such a man can not be secured for $3,000 a year. While a greater increase was asked by the department, the committee decided to recommend an increase of only $600, so as to give this officer the sum of $3,600 a year for his services.

Mr. PAYSON. Has the gentleman heard of any of these officials who say they will resign unless their salaries are raised?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I can not tell the gentleman from Illinois what they intend to do in the future, but I have been informed by the chief of the Pension Department that many of these officers have resigned because they could earn more in private life than they could earn by retaining their official position.

Mr. PAYSON. But does he know there are any of them who will resign unless their salaries are raised?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I am not speaking for the future. The salary of a qualified surgeon is $2,000. The committee recommend an increase in the salary of qualified surgeons of $500, and to increase the force of qualified surgeons by one, so as to enable the board to keep up with the business of the department.

When you come to the eighteen examiners, we find at present there are detailed some twelve or fourteen clerks from the ordinary duties of the office to perform the duties that ought to be intrusted only to expert medical men. The department says it can not get the services of qualified, skillful medical men for $1,800 a year, and we therefore increased the salary $200, making it $2,000. We also provide this force shall be increased by the addition of six, so that the clerks who have been detailed from the regular duties of the Department to perform the duties of these medical officers can be sent back to their desks.

I would advocate, Mr. Chairman, no measure in the line of extravagance, but in order that the Pension Department may keep up with its work, and in order that we may hear no more complaints against the long and wearisome delay in the medical department of the Pension Office, which come from all over the land from those who are applicants for pensions under the law, I join in asking for the passage of this bill. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It ought to be sufficient to inform this House that this measure is asked for by the Commissioner of Pensions and by the medical board having in charge the examination of these cases. The chief referee and his assistants were sent for by the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department and examined in reference to the necessity for this bill.

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has asked the question, I can inform him on the authority of the medical referee that there have been repeated resignations in that force, and that they have been unable to obtain the highest class of medical talent on account of the very small compensation allowed. Members will recollect it is different in that profession from any other. When the physician leaves his home and comes here to fill a public position his medical practice is absolutely destroyed. It is not like an attorney, who can go anywhere and by his skill build up a practice. With them their practice is dependent on the knowledge and confidence of the people gained by years of practice as well as upon their skill. These salaries are too small for the class of work they do.

Any one who had occasion to converse with the medical men in charge of this work will know their work is not limited to the ordinary hours during the day, but they are compelled night after night to take their papers home with them for examination, in order to keep up with the work in the office. It is a matter of interest to every applicant for a pension throughout the land, and to every applicant for an increase of pension, that they should have a constant board to examine their claims. I do not think any member will for one moment believe the salary is too large for that class of service, and when the Commissioner informs us as well as the referee there is not a sufficient force to keep up with the work in that department, all we can do is to pass the bill and give them such a sufficient force.

I am aware there is a prejudice against an increase of salaries.

Mr. STRUBLE. Where does it exist?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It exists in the minds of some of our best members who deprecate the raising of salaries, but as this measure is in the line of greater intelligence, in the line of increased usefulness in a position of this kind, I do not think gentlemen will allow an objection of that kind to prevail with them.

Mr. GEAR. How long have these salaries remained as they are now?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not know how long.

Mr. GEAR. Have they not remained for years as they are now?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not know to a certainty; I think they have, but in reference to this matter we are legislating for the future. I presume not a gentleman in this House will say that, for the chief referee of the Pension Department, a salary of $3,600 is too high. We pay that to clerks in this House.

Mr. GEAR. I am not opposed to the passage of the bill, but I would like to have the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] answer whether these salaries have not remained as they are for the last year.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We have been told that some of these officials have resigned because the salary was too low. I do not know myself how that matter may be. I am legislating for the future and not for the past. I only know that the present salary is insufficient, and that this increase ought to be granted.

Mr. GEAR. But I have asked if that salary has not been the rule heretofore, and the gentleman says he is unable to answer the question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Are you opposed to increasing the salary?

Mr. GEAR. Not at all.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then why are you taking up my time? [Laughter.]

Mr. GEAR. I am only seeking information. I thought I could get it from a member of the committee. Now, how does the gentleman know that these salaries ought to be increased?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. From the very best authority. From the authority of Dr. Campbell himself——

Mr. GEAR. A very good man.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And who says that the salaries are so small that he can not retain competent men, and that they must be increased.

Mr. STRUBLE. Is it not a little strange that it has been only discovered since the Democrats have had control there that the salaries are too small?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why, my dear sir, if you have any faith in your future some of your birds may get in some day. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. Oh! we expect that, and very soon.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not think that the question of politics has ever entered into the workings of that bureau, certainly not under its present management.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Oh, yes.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Is it at all probable, or has the gentleman reason to assume, that these parties will resign because of an insufficiency of salary?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I understand they will.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Very well, then all that the Department needs to do is to draw a sight draft on the First district of Kentucky, and we will supply them.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Can they draw a sight draft on the district for the same amount of brains and intelligence required?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, and for all the experience and capacity of every kind that is necessary; and their Democracy guaranteed. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not think there can be any question of the ability of the men now filling the positions. What the country wants, and what we ought to have, is an efficient service; and as the time is very short within which to pass this bill I hope there will be no further objection.

I yield the floor back to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CHEADLE. In view of what has been said by my distinguished colleague from Missouri in reference to the over-work done in this department, I send to the desk and ask to have read an article from the New York Tribune of this morning.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. How does that get into my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield the floor.

Mr. STRUBLE. And everybody being in favor of your bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have no objection to the gentleman having leave to print anything he pleases; but I do not want the time of the House to be taken up by reading irrelevant matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield the time back to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON]. The Chair supposed, however, when the gentleman from Indiana was recognized, that he had merely risen to ask a question.

Mr. CHEADLE. I understood the gentleman had yielded the floor, and when he had concluded I rose and asked recognition.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the gentleman wants to oppose the bill, I will yield him some time myself.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Unless some gentleman desires to be heard on the other side of this question, I shall ask for a vote.

Mr. TAULBEE. I want to be heard on it myself.

Mr. ROGERS. And several of us.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana desires to be heard and was on the floor.

Mr. CHEADLE. I desire to have read as a part of my remarks an article from the New York Tribune, which I sent to the desk.

The Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

CAN SUCH THINGS BE?—HERE IS A PLAIN DUTY OF CONGRESS—PUBLIC FUNDS FOR CAMPAIGN USES—A PLAIN VIOLATION OF LAW—CLEVELAND'S VETOES TO BE DEFENDED—WHAT WILL IT COST?

[By telegraph to the Tribune.]

WASHINGTON, August 28.

The retaliatory message——

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. That the article being read, or the head lines which have been read, clearly indicate that it does not relate to the pending question. There are members who want to oppose this bill, and as the time is limited we do not want to have irrelevant matter injected into this discussion.

Mr. CHEADLE. If the gentleman will just allow this article to be read he will see that it has a bearing upon the question.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor and can debate the question as he pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman claimed the floor and sent this article to the desk as a part of his remarks. The Chair thinks that the rule requires, especially in this consideration hour, that the remarks applied to a pending bill should relate to the subject-matter under consideration.

Mr. CHEADLE. But I ask to have read an article which bears directly upon the management of the Pension Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is one with regard to raising the salaries of certain officials.

Mr. TAULBEE. If it relates to the bill under consideration, I do not object; but the time is very limited and should not be consumed in reading irrelevant matter.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can debate the bill in any manner he pleases.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Having the floor, my colleague has the right to proceed in his own way.

Mr. TAULBEE. I insist that the point of order must be well taken, and the gentleman, if he is going to oppose or favor the bill, must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But the gentleman has the right to oppose the bill in his own way.

Mr. CANNON. The undoubted right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is as to whether the matter submitted by the gentleman from Indiana is in order. The question raised by the gentleman from Kentucky is to the effect that in a debate of this kind the gentleman should confine himself to the bill under discussion.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have no objection to the article being read if the matter relates to this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CHEADLE. The reason that I asked that this article should be read is in opposition to this bill. The point of this bill is that there are not enough clerks in the Pension Office to transact the current business of that bureau, and that article shows that they are detailed for other purposes. I desire it read as part of my remarks.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

Mr. CHEADLE. I reserve my time.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1540) to provide for increasing the efficiency of the medical division of the Pension Department and had come to no resolution thereon.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, my object being to ask further consideration of the Oklahoma bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to reserve the remainder of the time that is under the control of the friends of the bill, which is about twenty-six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-six minutes of his time remaining.

[Mr. HOOKER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, what disposition has been made of the time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] proposes to yield the remainder of his time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. PAYSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana so much time as he may desire, reserving to the gentleman from Missouri such portion as they may arrange.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has twenty-seven minutes remaining. How much time does he desire to yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. PAYSON. Twenty minutes.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Before the gentleman from Indiana begins, I will say that I have no desire to occupy seven minutes, and if he needs that additional time I hope he will go on and occupy it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I send to the desk a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and ask that it may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, which, as the Chair understands, is accepted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The first clause of my proposition is the same as that of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "at the price of $1.25 per acre," in the twelfth and thirteenth lines of section 5, and insert the following:

"Under the homestead law only, except section 2301 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois. The remainder is what I propose to add.

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

Provided, however, That no person seized of any lands in any State or Territory, or who shall have sold land in any State or Territory within three months before the time of the taking effect of this act, shall be authorized to enter any of the lands covered by the provisions of this act. The Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe all needful rules to give full effect to this provision: And provided further, That all provisions of law touching the rights of soldiers and officers who served in the Army of the United States during the late war, entering public lands, shall apply to the lands embraced in this act.

Mr. PAYSON. I would prefer, Mr. Chairman, that the proviso should be moved as an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what I am proposing—that the proviso be treated as an addition to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. One question as to the meaning of this proposition. Is it understood that if a person having sold a town lot and converted it into money should go to this Territory to locate upon these lands he would not be permitted to do so?

Mr. HOLMAN. You have the two alternatives. You must either adopt a provision similar to this, or else you must permit this land, which is claimed to be very valuable, to be taken up by persons who are already wealthy, not the persons for whose benefit the homestead law was intended.

Mr. SPRINGER. But a man who had a very small tract of land, not worth, perhaps, more than fifteen or twenty dollars, ought not to be deprived of the right of locating a homestead.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] accepts that amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir; I am content with that.

[Mr. HOLMAN withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire now to yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to devote a few minutes to the discussion of the propositions of law presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER]. I need not take the time of this committee to call attention to the statutes creating the grants of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas, and the Atlantic and Pacific companies, because the gentleman from Mississippi has admitted in the course of his remarks that in these grants there was a special reservation of the power on the part of the Government to alter, amend, or repeal the acts in question. I simply want to read from the opinion delivered by Justice Miller in the case of Greenwood vs. Freight Company, reported in 105 United States Reports, on page 17. This was a decision hinging upon the very question presented here as to the effect of the reserved power of the Government to alter, amend, or repeal any of these granting acts. This, however, was a decision upon a similar provision embodied in an act passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts, which he quotes as follows:

> Every act of incorporation passed after the 11th day of March, 1831, shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal at the pleasure of the Legislature.

In regard to which Justice Miller says:

> It would be difficult to supply language more comprehensive or expressive than this.
> Such an act may be amended; that is, it may be changed by additions to its terms or by qualifications of the same. It may be altered by the same power, and it may be repealed. What is it may be repealed? It is the act of incorporation. It is this organic law on which the corporate existence of the company depends which may be repealed, so that it shall cease to be a law; or the Legislature may adopt the milder course of amending the law in matters which need amendment, or altering it when it needs substantial change. All this may be done at the pleasure of the Legislature. That body need give no reason for its action in the matter. The validity of such action does not depend on the necessity for it or on the soundness of the reasons which prompted it.

Now, when the Congress of the United States passed the act granting to these railroads this power and donated to them these valuable franchises on certain conditions, it reserved at the same time the right at any time thereafter to alter, amend, or repeal the provision granting the corporation, and in fact to repeal everything that gave any power or vitality to the corporations; and if that reservation is contained in the act, no rights could be acquired by any purchaser of the mortgage bonds, because they bought in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court, the highest judicial tribunal in the known world, and in the face of the law which embodied this right to repeal.

They could not claim to be innocent purchasers or to have vested rights, and as innocent purchasers claiming a right under the act of the railroad incorporation to have an interest in the property mortgage, because at the very foundation, at the very threshold of their claim they would be met by this clause which virtually says they could not be innocent purchasers within the meaning of the law, and with this decision of the Supreme Court which expressly declares the meaning and intent of that clause to alter, amend, or repeal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to devote the few moments of the remaining time in answer to the suggestion of my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and in relation to the amendment which he has suggested.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PETERS. If I have time when I have concluded what I desire to say I will yield with pleasure.

Mr. HOOKER. I would like to ask the gentleman if the grant of land had been made to the railroad, and the road had constructed the requisite number of miles to acquire the right, and pending the construction of the road had mortgaged, and the company who had bought it conveyed an interest in it, would that interest be destroyed by a repeal of the law?

Mr. PETERS. In view of the decision of the Supreme Court, I should say certainly that mortgage would be void and the conveyance would have no effect, because it was done with a full knowledge that the Congress that created the company had the right to repeal the law.

Mr. HOOKER. The opinion which the gentleman has quoted from Justice Miller was an opinion passing upon another feature, and referred to enactments hereafter made.

Mr. PETERS. That is very true, but my friend from Mississippi will recollect that it is a well-known provision of law that in any question involving the language of a grant the construction is usually against the grantee and in favor of the grantor; that wherever there is a question as to the act the construction shall be against the privileges that are claimed to be conferred by the grant.

But now I desire to call attention to the question which has been presented in regard to the homestead provision. Out West, in that great country, we have had there a sentimental feeling in regard to the homestead law. But I care not how much sentiment may hang around any bill or project, however grand it may be, or however high the character of the men who may plead for it, unless it passes the crucible of business experience and knowledge it fails as far as that section of the country is concerned. The sentimental feature of the homestead question has been eliminated by the practical application of the law. Much has been said about that homestead law. It has certainly been grand in its provisions, and I concede it. It has settled up to a great extent our Western country.

But, Mr. Chairman, there has grown up in the minds of the people of the West who have had experience with its workings and influence an opinion that there are grave defects in that law and the very defects which we desire to eliminate by the provisions of the pending bill. How is it now if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois goes into the bill? What will be the effect? So far as Oklahoma is concerned, what is the result? It simply opens up for the benefit of the interloper, for the benefit of the speculator, for the benefit of the adventurer, who does not desire to use that right for the purpose of making a home for himself, all these valuable lands. Gentlemen say this can not be done. I dispute that proposition. You can go into that Territory and file upon 160 acres of land and pay the sum of $2 at the land office. You have then six months within which to establish a residence on it. The party goes immediately to a real estate agent and says "I have filed upon 160 acres of land, but I want you to sell it for me, for I don't intend to go on it. Sell it for fifty or a hundred dollars, whatever you can get for it, and when you make the sale I will sign the release." And when a man goes there and files upon this quarter-section of land with any idea of making it a home, under the provision of this bill we say, "You must not only get your $2 but you must also get your $50, the first payment on your claim at $1.25 an acre, before you get it." Then when he makes his payment he can go upon it and by this act shows he intends to make it his home and a home for his family. He is not a speculator and not an adventurer going there for the purpose of holding a quarter of a section in order to make $50 or $100 on it by holding it for six months.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman mean to be understood by the committee as saying that the same evasions are made of the homestead law with the commutation feature eliminated.

Mr. PETERS. That is the point. That has been the experience on this matter in the West in the great homestead regions, and I state that there have been greater frauds committed under the homestead law than under any other land law.

Mr. PAYSON. Only under the commutation feature of it. I hope the gentleman does not mean to say that with the commutation feature out there are frauds under the homestead law.

Mr. PETERS. Not entirely so.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman yield for one further question on that point?

Mr. PETERS. I say that under the homestead law proper, outside of the commutation feature, there have been a great number of cases where frauds have been committed. From its first application up to the present time there have been frauds carried on time and time again under the homestead law.

Mr. LIND. If the gentleman will yield to me I will answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LIND. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois from actual experience how it is possible that speculations may be carried on under the homestead act, and how they are frequently carried on.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman need not take any time to instruct me upon that.

Mr. NELSON. My colleague has had a number of years' experience and can fully explain that matter.

Mr. LIND. I understood that the gentleman from Illinois had asked a question and that he desired an answer. You are aware that under the homestead law as it existed until within the last three years a party was entitled, after he had taken out his first papers and filed them under the homestead act, to go and settle on the land. In the mean time the land, from the date of filing his claim, was withdrawn from entry and actually excluded entry or occupancy by other persons, and during this preliminary six months he had as good a title to possession of the land as though he held a warranty deed, and as if he had the fee to it. He could apply to his agent or attorney to sell it for him, and it could be sold for $100 or $150.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield the gentleman a minute more.

Mr. LIND. The law was amended so that the man instead of having only six months for this preliminary purpose was given a year. There was nothing justifying it. Now, under the act of Congress he could not only hold possession of the land without entering upon the land, but he had as good a title as a warranty deed; and I say that gives ample room for speculation. All Western men will agree that there has been speculation in land under those provisions. I think I have answered the gentleman's question.

Then, upon another point: Some of these entries upon the public lands are in excess of 160 acres allowed by law, and that excess must be paid for in cash at the rate of $1.25 an acre or $2.50 an acre. If a man relinquishes that land he forfeits his first payment. In these instances it has been my observation that where the excess is large the records of the land office will show that there are really no relinquishments.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on the pending motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time do you want?

Mr. NELSON. I do not suppose ten or more than fifteen minutes at the outside.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I take a different view of this question from that which has been presented by most of the gentlemen who have debated it, or at least those gentlemen whose remarks have come under my observation. All that has been said about the beneficent provisions of the homestead law when it was originally passed in 1862 I entirely concur in. At that time we had a vast area of unsettled territory, and we were in the midst of a great war. It was then of the utmost importance to increase and enlarge expeditiously our resources and our sphere of production, and under the circumstances, with such a large area of unsettled land and with the burdens of a great war upon our hands, it was one of the wisest possible measures to pass the homestead law for the promotion of the rapid settlement and development of our country.

But, Mr. Chairman, we should always as legislators be guided, not by considerations of sentiment, not by considerations that existed twenty-six years ago, but by the existing condition of affairs. To-day the conditions are entirely different from what they were in 1862. At that time, as I have just said, our great need was to hasten our growth in population and production. Now, I think the universal sentiment is, if we go deep down into our hearts, that we are growing too rapidly for our own good, that our population is increasing too rapidly, that it is coming in faster than we can properly assimilate it and make it a part of ourselves.

For myself I can truly say that while I came here from my distant and far-away home in Minnesota, imbued with the narrow and provincial idea that the sooner we could settle up the unsettled portions of our country the better, yet now, sir, with the education I have received in this Chamber, and with an enlarged sphere of vision here acquired, and looking at our country as an entirety and as something more than the State of Minnesota, I have come to the conclusion that we are, and to some extent have been, too prodigal of our public lands. That we had better reserve some of them for our children and our grandchildren, and that there is no occasion now to continue the policy of giving them away broadcast to the first comer, as there was occasion for that policy in the midst of the war, twenty-six years ago. These, sir, are my views now, and, therefore, as a business proposition—for there is no occasion to bring in matters of sentiment here, nor no occasion to bring in politics—as a business proposition, I think it is fair and just to buy these surplus lands from the Indians at a reasonable price—$1.25 per acre, as proposed in the bill—and I think it is also fair and just under existing conditions that the people who are to get these lands from the Government—under the homestead laws only—should pay that small price for them.

Remember that prior to 1862 the settlement of the public domain of this country was chiefly carried on under the old pre-emption law of 1841, and under that law the nation made a very rapid and healthy growth and progress, although settlers were obliged to pay for their lands at the rate of $1.25 per acre. In 1862 the circumstances, as I have said, were peculiar and they justified the passage of the homestead law. But what was good policy then—what was good for the nation twenty-six years ago—may not be good policy now, and I do not think it is. I agree to a large extent with the sentiment that has been manifested by the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. HOLMAN]—a sentiment expressed, perhaps, not so much in words as in acts—that we had better be a little careful of what is left of our public domain. Our public domain, in spite of everything that may be said to the contrary, has been our great economic safety-valve, the place where the tired and teeming thousands from our large and crowded cities have gone and found homes and rest.

Before I proceed further I will for a moment call your attention to the peculiar amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. I do not really think he means what the amendment provides. Construing one portion of the amendment literally, it would result in this: If a poor laboring man in a manufacturing town has a little piece of ground—it need not be more than the tenth or the twentieth part of an acre—with a little cabin upon it, and he should see fit to sell it and move out West—into Oklahoma, if you please—he could get none of that land under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, because it cuts off everybody who owns any real estate or who has sold any real estate within three months prior to the passage of this act. Then there is another improvident provision in the amendment. It gives to soldiers and sailors all the rights they have heretofore had under our public-land laws, as I understand it.

Now, one of the rights that the soldiers have had is what is known as "the additional homestead right;" that is to say, a soldier who has had a homestead of 80 or 120 acres or any amount less than 160 acres can get the right to locate and enter without settlement the number of acres his homestead was short of 160 acres, and this right has been used and in practice made available as land-scrip. This scrip, I am informed, is worth some $30 an acre, and is now mainly used in locating town sites. Under the provisions of this amendment this scrip could be used to locate lands in Oklahoma, and speculators and land-grabbers would no doubt be swift to avail themselves of the privilege without stint.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman understand the law to make those additional homestead rights assignable?

Mr. NELSON. Not technically nor directly, but indirectly and in practice, by means of powers of attorney.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that the law?

Mr. NELSON. That has been the practice and still is unless the law has been changed recently, of which I am not aware.

Mr. HOLMAN. There never has been any law to authorize any such assignments.

Mr. NELSON. I will tell you how it has been. I will explain that. Here is the way they do it. Suppose my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], has a "soldier's additional" for 20 acres. He can not directly and in form assign it to me; but he makes and delivers to me a power of attorney, and attaches the scrip to it, and authorizes me thereby to locate the scrip in his name. Then he gives another power of attorney authorizing me to sell that land after I have located it. That is the way the matter has been managed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the Secretary of the Interior has held those assignments void.

Mr. PAYSON. Let me make a suggestion. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is quite right in his statement as to the practice in regard to locating this scrip; but at a later stage in the consideration of this bill an amendment will be offered which will entirely obviate the difficulty suggested.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I have understood, upon inquiry at the Land Office, that the practice referred to is not permitted any more.

Mr. PAYSON. It ought to be prohibited by law, and I hope we shall do so by an amendment to be offered at a later stage of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. I only know that some of the most valuable pine lands in the State of Minnesota were located by so-called "soldier's additionals;" and this scrip was procured mainly from soldiers in Missouri.

Mr. BLAND. And Congress passed an act permitting that to be done—amending the original law.

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, no, there is no law authorizing such assignments; the matter rests on practice only.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to repeat what I have already said, that this matter should be treated as a business proposition. I say that the facts, circumstances, and conditions which justified the passage of the homestead law in 1862, which proposed to distribute the public lands broadcast among the people of all the world, do not exist to-day; and there is reason why we should not be prodigal of our public lands. Speaking as an American citizen, with the weal of the whole country at heart, I think it our duty to act in a cautious and conservative spirit in reference to this question. I would like to see some of our public lands left for our grandchildren, and I think most gentlemen here entertain a similar wish. If we make provision, and the bill does, that none but homestead settlers can obtain these lands, and that they can obtain them at the cheap and almost nominal price of $1.25 an acre, I think that it will be fair and just to all concerned, and it will be a considerable saving of money to the Treasury of the United States. Any man who wants land and who has the "grit" and courage to go out into this Territory, open up a farm and establish a home, would certainly be ready and willing to pay the small pittance of $1.25 an acre in installments as the bill provides.

I have been a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs during three Congresses, including the present; and so far as I know, in every instance, with the exception of the ratification of the treaties with the Indians in Northern Montana, we have made provision that whatever compensation was to be given to the Indians for the relinquishment of their rights should be reimbursed to the Government by the settlers who might obtain the lands. We have made such a provision in two bills which have passed during this Congress, one with reference to the great Sioux reservation, opening up 12,000,000 acres in Dakota, where 50 cents per acre was to be paid, and the other relating to reservations embracing over 4,000,000 acres in Minnesota, where it was provided that $1 per acre should be paid by the settler. Now, if away up in Northern Minnesota, near the Canadian line, homestead settlers have been required to pay $1 an acre, why should not settlers upon this land in the center of the continent, the very cream of our public lands, be content to pay the pittance of $1.25 an acre, the amount the Indians are to receive? There is no pressing or public necessity for buying lands from the Indians and giving away the lands for nothing.

I think that under existing circumstances this proposition—tendered in the bill—is the fairest way of disposing of this question. I believe the people who want these lands will be perfectly satisfied to pay this small price and take them under the homestead law. I will add that in reference to the bill proposing to open to settlement some 4,000,000 acres of Indian lands in Minnesota, I have not heard a word of objection from any persons in my district to the payment of $1 an acre for that land. In fact they are all perfectly well satisfied with that arrangement, considering it fair and just to the Indians and the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. And they have paid it.

Mr. NELSON. The bill has not yet taken effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON] will now be recognized for the seven minutes remaining of the time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if the bill for the organization of this Territory is to become a law I am opposed to the provision that requires the payment of $1.25 an acre from settlers on these lands who served in the Union armies and navies during the late war; and I am also opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] as amended by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. I hope that amendment will not prevail, as it will interfere with an opportunity on the part of the Government to do an act that will be the crowning glory of its life for all the years to come.

Something has been said here as to the question of "sentimentality." Somehow or other a mere demand in behalf of old-fashioned justice seems in the minds of some people to smack of "sentimentality." Mr. Chairman, if this vast tract, one of the fairest portions of our goodly heritage, is to be organized into a Territory with a view to the ultimate establishment of a State it seems to me nothing better can be done than to consecrate these lands, wholly and solely if need be, as homes for the men who defended the flag and kept it flying unspotted in the sky.

The adoption of the gentleman's amendment going generally to all classes of men in the distribution of its benefits, would preclude the Government from a righteous act in recognition of the class of men provided for in the amendment that I have prepared, and that was sent to the Clerk's desk on yesterday to be printed in the RECORD for information.

No country ever had the opportunity to bestow at once so fair a heritage, so rich a crown, and such just and fitting reward to her conquering heroes, who went forth in the hour of the nation's peril to fight her battles and preserve intact her holdings in and on the earth, as is found in the opportunity that presents itself to this Government in the disposal of the territory that is the subject-matter of the pending measure.

The strong, sturdy, honest, patriotic men who consecrate their lives to lawful toil to supply their daily bread, and who in times of peace create a nation's wealth, and in times of peril defend on land and sea the nation's life, are the first and highest consideration of every just and well-ordered government.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the popular branch of the law-making power of a government whose great distinguishing features among the nations of earth are its policy of the equality of men before the law, and its watchful, tender, generous care of the lowly and the poor, the only class in any government that need such care, do not let pass, I conjure you, this splendid opportunity, at this auspicious moment in the nation's life, to do an act that will at once do more for the laboring man and to exalt us as a nation than all other acts contemplated by this Congress combined—an act that will rear a grand monument which will shine out upon the world forever an everlasting testimony to the nation's righteousness, her chiefest glory through all the ages.

Here, in the very heart of this great Republic, on the richest and fairest legal subdivision of the nations of the earth, let us provide homes for the brave, patriotic men who saved the nation's life. Here, in the midst of this great nation, let us ordain and establish the nation's defenders in the past, from whence, inspired by the nation's gratitude, they, and their posterity after them, will sally forth when new dangers shall, unhappily, again threaten the nation's life. Here let us provide homes for the nation's heroes, the old guard, the loyal, lingering remnants of the grandest armies that ever met the shock of battle. With what reason can we withhold this boon to this most meritorious class of men that a nation's gratitude, fairly expressed to-day, would place upon the pension-roll, when we consider that it only grants them such generous conditions as to homes on the earth as the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois seeks to confer on all men without regard to race, religion, or nationality.

Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen may call this proposition fanciful and utopian, but all in candor must concede that here is presented one of those opportunities that rarely come to nations, as they rarely come to men, to approximate the ideal in the affairs of State.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this proposition may so favorably impress itself upon this Congress that it will now carve out of this splendid territory a home for the nation's heroic defenders that will stand forever the foremost monument to the nation's virtue.

Mr. SPRINGER. The time remaining of seven minutes belongs to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. I do not care to occupy it. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. There are eighteen minutes remaining on the other side.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield seven minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire very briefly to present to this committee a few considerations in connection with this bill. I confess those of us who live in the States contiguous to this Territory are much interested in this proposed legislation. It is true as has been suggested here that more than five hundred thousand petitioners have sent their names to this Congress, asking for this legislation, and more than four million people are deeply interested in it, watching our efforts here on the floor of this House to consummate legislation that is fair to the Indians, fair to the settlers, fair to the country, fair to all, and which in the end will dedicate this unoccupied and vacant domain to homes for American citizens. And that is all that is asked by the friends of this bill. It is a condition, in the language of another, that confronts us, and not a theory.

As was suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that great Territory was originally set apart for Indian occupation, but conditions have changed, and it is now found that all of it is not needed for Indian occupancy. It has been found that much of the Territory is not needed by the Indians residing within its boundaries. As early as 1874, if my memory serves me correctly, Congress declared by act that no further Indians should be located and settled in that Territory. But before that treaties had been made with the Creeks and Seminoles setting apart what is known as the "Oklahoma country" for settlement by freedmen and friendly Indians. Negotiations were also had with the Cherokees for the settlement of what is known as the "Cherokee Strip" under like conditions. These negotiations were had in 1866, and because those tribes did not need these lands it was then thought good policy to gather the nomadic Indian tribes from the plains and locate them with these tribes who were settled in the Indian Territory. But in the end the public sentiment of the country was aroused against that policy. Tribes located in that Territory broke over the boundaries that were prescribed for them and committed depredations on lawful settlers living in adjacent States and Territories. Homes were desolated, communities were pillaged, and the torch was applied to settlements occupying lands in adjacent States. Because of these depredations and outbreaks, and the murder of innocent women and children, Congress declared by law that no other Indians should be settled there.

This is the condition that confronts us now. The situation is a practical and logical one. What shall we do with these lands? We have the petition, as I have already suggested, of more than five hundred thousand persons, asking us to open them to white settlement. If that is done, upon what terms and conditions shall it be done? We all agree it should be done upon such conditions as will be fair to the Indians, fair to the settler, and which will be fair to the country.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] challenged the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to point out a provision in this bill which is not fair to all and which would not protect the country against fraud and the fraudulent settlement of these lands. No answer was given to that challenge, and no answer can be given to it, for there is no such provision in the bill. All the provisions of the bill are fair. Every settler is to remain in the occupation of the land for three years before he can secure a title and to exemplify his good faith by his works. Then he has to make payment for the land at $1.25 per acre. It is to be paid for in installments; that is all, and the proceeds are to be used in paying the expenses of the survey and in the extinguishment of the Indian title. Is there anything wrong about that?

But it is suggested that they should have these lands for nothing; that they should be dedicated to these settlers without price. To this, personally, I would have no objection, and those of us who are opposing the proposition are not posing here as opponents of the homestead law. We are not standing here to say a word in opposition to that beneficent legislation, whose effects have been so good and whose influence has been so widespread throughout the West; but recognizing the conditions that exist to-day, we say it is not best to incorporate into this bill such a condition as that, for the reason, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], that if the provision is incorporated in the bill, in the judgment of its friends and those who are familiar with the circumstances surrounding this proposed legislation, it will secure its defeat.

I am not inclined to impute unfair motives to my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON]. His efforts in behalf of the settlers and in behalf of legislation to protect the public domain from unlawful occupation are well known to the House and to the country. I am not inclined to impute unfair motives to him. But it does seem a little strange that every man who is opposed to the bill in this House is championing and standing by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and if the gentleman is in good faith he should beware of his friends.

Now, sir, a word further. As was suggested by my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], we have by legislation at this session of Congress, by bills passed, opened to settlement almost, if not quite, 30,000,000 acres of Indian lands. If the treaties with the Indians are consummated thirty millions and more will be opened to settlement by this legislation, and yet, with a single exception, there has not been a provision incorporated into any of those bills making to those lands the homestead laws applicable. The gentleman from Illinois did not rise in his place and offer an amendment of that character to any of these bills. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] did not rise in his place and offer an amendment of that character to either bill. They were bills which provided and authorized negotiations, as this does, with the Indians to extinguish their title to certain lands that they might be opened to settlement. And for the reasons controlling that legislation we oppose these amendments offered to this bill.

As was suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota, the settlers are not asking for these amendments. The men who desire to go there and make for themselves homes are not asking it, and the petitioners who speak for the homeless are not asking for it. All recognize that the Indians have some interest in these lands and that interest is to be paid for, and the settlers ask that they may be permitted to go upon these lands as settlers have been permitted to go upon other Indian lands and to possess them upon terms fair and just to all; and in the name of these people I hope this proposed legislation will not be embarrassed or defeated by these amendments.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is a very good talker, and we all know that he is earnestly opposed to this bill, and yet, Mr. Chairman, the only argument that he could offer in opposition to it was to stand here on the floor for three-quarters of an hour and suggest that the railroad companies would acquire title, or might acquire title, to some of these lands if the bill passed, while, as he knew very well, in the last Congress all the unearned lands granted of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company were forfeited; and there is a provision in the bill granting lands to the Neosho Valley Railroad Company which clearly settles that question. It reads:

Provided further, That said lands shall not in any manner be disposed of or encumbered by said company, or its assigns, except as the same are patented under the provisions of this act.

And again, no lands ever granted to that company are within the boundaries of this proposed Territory, and notwithstanding that, the gentleman attempts to say that there is peril from the railroad companies in the passage of this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD].

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I propose to address myself exclusively to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]; and as a predicate for what I shall say on that subject, I desire to quote the gentleman's own eloquent language, that the strongest bulwark of American liberty is to be found in the homes of our people and in the laws which grant and secure them homes. I call the attention of my friend, however, to the fact that the effect if not the object—and I do not think it is the object—of his amendment would be to discriminate against the very class of people who most need homes and who would be most apt to try to secure them, because his amendment provides that no man who is possessed of lands anywhere else, however small the quantity or value, or who, within three months prior to his filing an application for a homestead, shall have sold any land, shall have the right, or be entitled to the benefit of the homestead law in the proposed Territory.

Now, there are men throughout this whole country, men of small means, mechanics, artisans, laborers, many of our best people, that are freeholders to a small extent, but whose circumstances force them to seek homes in a new country, and who will want to sell for that purpose. Many will want to sell homes which have become encumbered and go where they can make new ones which they may hope to own and preserve. I repeat that many small farmers, mechanics, laborers, and artisans, wanting to better their condition, often leave the crowded cities and towns, dispose of their little homes, go into the new country, and establish there for themselves and their families new homes. But these are discriminated against if the amendment is adopted.

I am for the bill as it came from the committee first; and even if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] is adopted, I would still vote for it. But I hold it would be an inexcusable discrimination against a poor but good class of our people who have small homes, many of them encumbered with debt, and who, if permitted, would sell them and thus enable themselves to make new homes under happier conditions, to adopt this amendment. There is no discrimination in the amendment of the gentleman against any class of men because they are large property holders. A man may be worth a million of dollars in property if not in real estate, and he may go under this amendment and enter a home upon these lands; but if he owns a little tract of ground, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] says, "even a lot in a cemetery," it would bar him from taking a home in this new country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen have seven minutes of their time remaining on either side.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to occupy a few minutes for the purpose of presenting one feature of this bill which has not been alluded to by the other side, and as to which I desire a specific explanation from the chairman of the committee. This bill includes within its scope the land known as the Neutral Strip, containg 3,768,000 acres, and a portion of which was a part of the old Texas purchase, costing this Government at that time the sum of 28 cents per acre. That land by the operation of this bill is the only land that does not require any negotiations. But upon it settlement may be made under the homestead law, as it is donated under the homestead law to the settler. The question I ask the chairman of the committee is, why does his committee recommend the opening of the best lands to homestead settlers without cost and impose a charge of $1.25 an acre on the balance of the land within the scope of the bill? Why do you apply the homestead principle to the Neutral Strip and refuse it with respect to the rest of the Territory?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer that question. The reason for this difference is simply this: the lands known as the Neutral Strip are public domain and not embarrassed in any way by Indian claims of title. It is part of the public domain and we have not to pay anything for it.

Mr. PAYSON. But we have paid for it.

Mr. SPRINGER. We did pay for it when we purchased it from the State of Texas. The gentleman from Illinois stated yesterday that we paid $16,000,000 for it; but I am glad to see that in his printed remarks in the RECORD he has corrected that according to the facts.

Mr. PAYSON. It is printed in the RECORD just as I stated it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman said that we paid sixteen millions for it.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not know what I stated. I have the paper here from which I read the statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. The truth is that we paid sixteen millions when we bought all the rest of the claims of the State of Texas for all the lands east of the Rio Grande and south of the Arkansas that are included in that amount.

Mr. PAYSON. I state that in my remarks on yesterday I read from the paper I now hold in my hand, giving a description of the territory for which the Government had paid $16,000,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, yes. That was for 61,000,000 acres of land the Government got in that purchase. It cost the Government 25 cents an acre. The reason why this land is not put under the homestead provisions that are now applied to all the public domain is that these lands are not encumbered with Indian claims, and it is not required that they should be paid for. We have a precedent for this in the legislation of Congress. When the Kansas and Nebraska act was passed there was a strip 3 miles wide on the southern boundary, from Arkansas west to Colorado, which belonged to the Cherokee Nation and was put into the State of Kansas, and a law was passed authorizing the sale of that 3-mile strip to actual settlers at various prices under the law, some at $2, others at $1.50, others at $1.25, and some at $1. That was sold subject to the occupancy of the settler, and the cost which had been paid for it. That strip is parallel to the whole length of the Indian Territory, known as the Cherokee Outlet, and the Government has already applied the principle to adjacent lands by selling to actual settlers.

I have seen a statement of the Secretary of the Interior showing that on the 1st day of November, 1887, there were in the Treasury $9,094,000, as the proceeds of the sale of Indian lands, to the credit of several Indian tribes whose lands were sold, and these proceeds have been received from actual settlers upon these lands. It is thus shown that this is precisely the policy of the Government, where we were getting titles to Indian lands, that the settlers pay for the land. That was done with the Pawnee Indian land. It was done in the case of all the Indian tribes in the entire States of Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa; and it has been the policy of Congress from the time we have been acquiring these Indian titles up to this time to require the settler to pay the amount that the Government had to pay. That is just what is required in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this provision is adopted and inserted in the bill, it will require an appropriation of $10,000,000 to carry it out. There are 8,000,000 acres and it will require an appropriation of $10,000,000 to pay for them. I do not believe that Congress intends to reverse the policy which the Government has pursued for these long years of requiring the settler to pay for the lands that we get from the Indians and require the Government to pay for them itself. These are very valuable lands. They are more valuable than we have ever had to offer to the actual settler. The settler has to go there and pay $1.25, according to the provisions of this bill, and reside there for three years. That has been incorporated in this measure, and if this last provision should be also incorporated in it, it would cost what I have stated. I have never heard the propriety of it stated until my colleague offered this amendment.

I do not believe that it is in the interest of the Government or of the settler or of the Indian to require the Government to purchase this land. If you start upon that principle you will put an obstruction in the way of acquiring the title to 100,000,000 acres of Indian lands that are now held by the Indians in excess of their wants, because the purchase of them will require the Government to pay $125,000,000 in order to obtain the title of the Indians.

Now, as to the point which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] made in regard to the railroads, I think that has been completely answered. The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad does not touch the lands in the Indian Territory, and the Atlantic and Pacific land grant was forfeited in the last Congress, so that whatever rights may have existed there have been disposed of, and this bill has nothing to do with them. Therefore, so far as the railroad lands are concerned, there is no advantage or disadvantage to be taken by anybody under this bill, and, in fact, the railroads cited by the honorable gentleman do not enter upon one foot of the soil that is covered by this bill, and why he ever referred to them is a mystery to me. I hope the friends of this bill will vote down this amendment. I believe it is the most dangerous proposition to the success of the bill that could be offered, and if it is adopted I believe this bill is defeated for this Congress. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. In the amendment which I offered the proviso was accepted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. I understand that it will have to be voted upon by the committee, and I prefer that the vote should be taken upon the two propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "at the price of $1.25 per acre," in lines 12 and 13, and insert "under the homestead laws only, except that section 2301 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The Clerk read the amendment to the amendment as originally offered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to modify that amendment by adding after the words "sold land" the words "exceeding fifty acres."

Mr. LYMAN. I ask to have the amendment read as modified.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is this an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], or would this proviso stand harmonious with the bill even if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] were lost.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question of fact which the Chair would not feel authorized to pass upon.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Does the proviso stand as a separate proposition or as an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Its parliamentary standing is as an amendment to an amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. As a proviso to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That no person seized of any lands in any State or Territory, or who shall have sold land exceeding 50 acres in any State or Territory within three months before the time of the taking effect of this act, shall be authorized to enter any of the lands covered by the provisions of this act. The Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe all needful rules to give full effect to this provision: Provided, further, That all provisions of law touching the rights of soldiers and sailors who served in the Army of the United States during the late war entering public land shall apply to the lands embraced in this act: Provided, further, That none of the lands referred to in this act shall be subject to entry by land-warrants or land-scrip of any description.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 77.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 42, noes 74.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be a quorum on this vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. As there is no quorum present, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] that he allow this question to go to the House with the understanding that there shall be a vote upon it there.

Mr. SPRINGER. If we can get an agreement that to-morrow at 3 o'clock we shall take the vote upon the final passage of the bill I will yield to the gentleman to move to amend the bill by this amendment and allow him to have a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

Mr. PAYSON. Of course the first part of the proposition of my colleague relates to what I can not control. I can only control myself as to the point that I make, and as to that I am content with his proposition.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I can not make any agreement. I hope, after the expression given by the Committee of the Whole, my colleague [Mr. PAYSON] will not insist on tellers.

Mr. PAYSON. Why can there not be unanimous consent that a yea-and-nay vote may be taken on this question in the House?

Mr. WEAVER. I can answer the gentleman's question why we can not give unanimous consent. After the fullest debate those who have heard the debate are overwhelmingly against the gentleman, and for that reason we do not wish to occupy time in taking the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYSON. That does not answer my question at all. That reply is hardly worthy of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEAVER. I think my answer is entirely proper, and worthy of anybody. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. PAYSON. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PAYSON and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

Mr. SPRINGER (before the count by tellers had begun). On consultation with my colleague [Mr. PAYSON], I desire to ask unanimous consent that the vote on this proposition be postponed until to-morrow when the Committee of the Whole shall resume its sitting, when probably more members will be present.

Objection was made.

The tellers proceeded with the count.

Mr. PAYSON (before the count was concluded). I am willing to withdraw the point that no quorum has voted, if it be understood that before the engrossment and third reading of the bill I shall be recognized to offer this amendment in the House and have a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

The tellers concluded the count and reported—ayes 49, noes 114.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I move to amend by inserting after the word "acre," in line 14 of section 5, the proviso which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all honorably discharged Union soldiers, sailors, and marines, who served in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, shall, in making entries for actual settlement under the provisions of this act, be and hereby are, exempted, in consideration of said service, from the payment of the purchase price provided for in this act; and proof of such actual service for a period of at least sixty days, and of honorable discharge therefrom, by such former soldier, sailor, or marine, shall be accepted by the United States in payment in full of the purchase price of the lands so entered upon, and of all fees in connection with said entry. And all land officers of the United States are directed to give preference to the persons making entries under this provision.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to inquire whether this amendment is limited to soldiers and sailors who received honorable discharge.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. It is.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 46, noes 47.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, and Mr. HOOKER. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

Mr. BAYNE. Evidently we can not conclude the vote on this proposition before the arrival of the hour for adjournment. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON] will withdraw his point of no quorum——

Mr. BAYNE. That is not necessary.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I do not withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] moves that the committee now rise.

Mr. PAYSON. It is understood here that the point of no quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. No, sir; it is not withdrawn.

The motion of Mr. BAYNE that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLOUNT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2825) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Baker.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate further insisted on its amendments numbered 105, 106, 107, 110, 116, 118, 119, 121, 127, 128, 221, 222, 223, 233, 234, 236, 238, 239, 240, 242, 243, 244, 248, 254, 255, 256, and 257 to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BECK.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to extend in the RECORD his remarks on the bill (H. R. 9623) to provide for printing Government securities in the highest style of art.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to extend in the RECORD his remarks of to-day on the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. BLAND, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to print in the RECORD remarks on the silver bill.

CLAIMS FOR BOUNTIES.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, asked unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 3407) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. What is the object?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There are two bills of the same character now on the Calendar.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why not let this bill remain on the Calendar? This is more complete than the other.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. FORAN: A bill (H. R. 11302) granting a pension to Diana D. Howard—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STONE, of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 11303) for the relief of John W. Peek—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11304) for the relief of James A. Cook—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McCULLOGH: A bill (H. R. 11305) granting a pension to Ann Ruffner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORROW: A bill (H. R. 11306) granting a pension to Mrs. Caroline B. Andrews—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOFFITT: A bill (H. R. 11307) for the relief of Benjamin F. Wickham—to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. J. M. ALLEN: Petition of William H. Kelton, of James Conn, of heir of Donald Street, and of J. W. Blakney, heir of Frederick Blakney, of Mississippi, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. C. L. ANDERSON: Petition of Demarius A. Johnson, administrator of William C. Johnson, of Scott County, Mississippi, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BLANCHARD: Petition of the Farmers' Union, of Rocky Mount, Bossier Parish, Louisiana, for relief from the bagging trust—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GEST: Evidence in the pension claim of Richard Ashcraft—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEE (by request): Deposition and affidavit in the claim of Sallie Hardemond—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LYNCH: Petition of Lackawanna Valley Council, No. 81, and of Wilkes Barre Council, No. 161, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, for the passage of Senate bill No. 553, to regulate immigration—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McCULLOGH: Resolutions of Red Stone Council, No. 78, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Brownsville, Pa., for the passage of Senate bill No. 553, for regulating and restricting immigration—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. O'FERRALL: Petition of William B. Carper, of J. M. Canter, administrator of Margaret McCauley; of Festus Swartz, administrator of James Swartz; of Josiah Rinker, of John Purcell, of Joseph Calwalader, and of John Ritter, of Frederick County, Virginia, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: Petition of heirs of Samuel Thompson of Madison County, Alabama, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: Petition of Mary A. Brower, widow of William A. Brower, of Giles County, Tennessee, for reference of her claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 30, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Margaret Bolio, of Detroit, Mich., praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of William H. Spencer and many other citizens of Rutland County, Vermont, praying for the passage of an act of Congress granting an increase of pension to Joseph Osborn, late a private in the Eleventh Michigan Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2244) to amend the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, giving pay to volunteer Army officers for services before they were mustered in, have instructed me to submit an adverse report thereon and recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The law already gives all the relief that is contemplated by the bill, and all to which the parties are entitled.

The report was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2182) to amend sections 4488 and 4489 of the Revised Statutes, requiring life-saving appliances on steamers, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3456) granting a pension to David O. Sanborn, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10245) granting an increase of pension to Hannibal Kimball, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9341) granting a pension to Mrs. Dulcena Noel, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11045) for the relief of Sam Rice Post, No. 6, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Iowa, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 13) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. 3504) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

LA ABRA SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom were referred the following resolutions, reported them without amendment; and they were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations have leave to require the attendance of witnesses before said committee or a subcommittee thereof to give evidence under oath respecting the claim of La Abra Silver Mining Company against the Government of Mexico; and said committee or subcommittee shall have power to administer oaths to such witnesses; and the expenses of their attendance and other necessary expenses in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the funds appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Senate, on certificates issued by the chairman of said committee or said subcommittee.

Resolved, 2. That counsel for or against said claimants shall be authorized to appear before said committee or subcommittee and examine and cross-examine any witnesses under the authority of this resolution.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3502) granting a pension to Juliana Roitsch; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN introduced a bill (S. 3503) for the relief of Bedney F. McDonald; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which a resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] was agreed to. I should like to have the motion called up and acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PLUMB, August 16, 1888, and adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate at the next session, so far as such claims have already been computed upon applications presented under the act of March 3, 1883, the amounts due postmasters and their representatives in the several States and Territories for services rendered the United States between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, the gross amount of earnings for each biennial term of service to be stated on the basis of the act of 1854, and the amount of compensation paid for the same term of service to be deducted therefrom, showing the actual difference in each case between the salary paid and the compensation computed on the basis of the act of 1854 for each biennal term of service; such report to be limited to cases in which the compensation paid is 10 per cent. or more less than the compensation already computed on the basis of the act of 1854, and to be made to the Senate from time to time as the statement covering the claims from each State shall be completed

Mr. COCKRELL. The resolution may involve a great deal of labor and it may involve intricate questions of law which have already been adjusted. I think it but fair and just that the resolution should be reconsidered and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, so that they may examine and determine what course should be pursued in regard to it. I therefore move that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered, and that the resolution be recalled from the Postmaster-General and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote by which the resolution was agreed to will be reconsidered, and the resolution, having been recalled from the Postmaster-General, will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It is so ordered.

LAND SUITS AND LAND PATENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] calling for information in relation to land suits and land patents. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CRAIG'S IMPROVEMENT IN TELEGRAPHY.

Mr. BLAIR submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be instructed to examine fully the system of mechanical telegraphing which Mr. D. H. Craig has now on exhibition in the Capitol by virtue of resolution of the Senate, and that in such investigation said committee secure the aid of competent and disinterested experts if they deem it necessary, and that any expenses required for proper examination into the merits of said system be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, under the rules, will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say with reference to the resolution that I should be glad if the committee would act soon, as there can be very slight expense incurred any way. The apparatus the Senate is familiar with, so far as any description I can give of it is concerned, from a previous debate on the subject. It is now here in the Capitol on exhibition. Several Senators have examined it, and, as I am told, with considerable surprise at what appears to be its perfection and efficiency. I observe that it has been examined, too, by gentlemen connected with the press. Recently there appeared in the New York Sun an editorial on the subject, calling special attention to it and saying it was a matter which ought to be investigated. The editor of the Sun, as I know, has given a great deal of attention to this subject personally.

I have here matter from the press which I could give at considerable length to the Senate from actual investigation, but without troubling the Senate to go into that, I think it is a subject which, as it will require but very little time and probably scarcely any money, the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which seems to have jurisdiction collectively, should examine with some care.

Mr. HALE. What does it cover? I did not hear the resolution.

Mr. BLAIR. It is a system of machine telegraphy. Does the Senator recollect the discussion upon the resolution I offered a short time ago with reference to the introduction of the machine for the purpose of examination in the Capitol?

Mr. HALE. No, I do not. I only make the inquiry which I put to the Senator, whether it covers anything that is proposed to be introduced here in the Capitol.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, no; unless Congress sees fit to make some arrangement for its public use.

Mr. HALE. That is all.

Mr. BLAIR. It is claimed by the inventors or the improvers of the system—for it is no new system—that they are able to transmit words to the amount of two thousand words at no greater cost in the actual transmission than the postage on a single letter. Hitherto the main difficulty attending the use of this system (which is a machine system of telegraphy as compared with the hand system or the Morse system) has been in the preparation of the message. Improvements have been made so that the message itself is now prepared with great celerity and at very slight expense by machinery, somewhat after the fashion of the type-writer, and it is claimed, as I say, by Mr. Craig, who is here and is a reputable gentleman as I know (he was born in New Hampshire, and I have known his family all my life), that the cost of the transmission of two thousand words does not exceed the cost of the postage upon a single letter; and that the cost of telegraphy may be made for all business purposes almost as slight as that of ordinary correspondence, gaining the advantage of time. The New York Sun of Tuesday last says:

We do not ourselves know what is the value of the system of mechanical telegraphing which Mr. D. H. Craig is now exhibiting in Washington; but of one thing we are certain, and this is that it ought to be inquired into by competent and disinterested experts. This much is due to Mr. Craig's long experience and minute knowledge of the business of telegraphing. When such an investigation has taken place we shall know what the invention is worth. It promises great things.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question, if he will allow me?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it his proposition that a Senate committee shall investigate the question of utility of some new patented invention?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the object of the resolution?

Mr. BLAIR. I will state the object of the resolution, for more ought to be stated. Mr. Craig has been engaged a long time in the effort to make these improvements which have now been made, and are claimed to be of very great value, so that telegraphy would be practically as cheap as ordinary correspondence through the post-office. His patents are assigned to nobody. He is an elderly gentleman and has the idea, which may or may not be a wise one, that here is something of very great value to the people, and before it is owned by a private corporation or by individuals he would be glad if Congress would examine the subject, with a view, if it considered it worth while, to make this, what he claims to be a great invention and improvement, available to the people in something of the way that postal telegraphy has been proposed hitherto.

It seemed to me that before there were embarrassments attending the ownership of these patents, as long as it is attended with no expense, it would be well for Congress to investigate the subject. The great difficulty we have, as everybody knows, in making available to the people at large this great utility in the conveyance of intelligence is the fact that here is a gigantic monopoly owning every telegraphic invention, owning every telegraphic wire and line, and having by contracts practically a mortgage of the existing system for the conveyance of intelligence by telegraph for all time to come, unless Congress or the country sees fit to buy them out at an extravagant valuation. If this be what is claimed for it by responsible parties who have examined it, there is an opportunity——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, is this in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. BLAIR. There is an opportunity to introduce a system which will supplant the other at comparatively a very slight expense, and the people can have it. I do not know whether there is anything in it or not, but I ask that the resolution be considered and early reported by the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5516) for the relief of John H. Weeks; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 201) to correct an error in the act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the morning business is through, I desire to submit a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the President's message in relation to the fishing rights of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has the floor on the message; but if he will yield to the Senator from Kansas, I have no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I designed this morning to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill because of the fact that the disposition of it is very important at this time on account of the lapse of appropriations for Army purposes, which occurs on the last day of this month unless some previous disposition is made of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that under the usage of the Senate the Senator from Kansas has a right to move the consideration of the appropriation bill. It is practically a question of privilege.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Kansas had better let the Senator from Mississippi first conclude his speech.

Mr. PLUMB. I was only going to make an inquiry. Of course I do not want to cut off the Senator from Mississippi, and I wish to submit myself to his convenience as much as possible, but this is a matter which ought to be disposed of to-day, at all events, whether now or a couple of hours later perhaps is not material, and I wished to inquire how much time the Senator from Mississippi desires to occupy.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think I shall consume over an hour.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I shall not move the consideration of the appropriation bill until the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the President's message of August 23.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The President's message is before the Senate, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the debate on the pending proposition has taken so wide a range that I am inclined to participate in it. Referring to the statement made yesterday evening by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in which he predicted very great financial troubles to this country coming from the alleged excess of imports over exports, I desire to say there is an ambiguity in that statement, so that we are apt to treat it as if it meant that the Government of the United States was, as a corporate body, as a business institution of itself, making exportations and importations. The fact is, Mr. President, that all these exports and all these imports are the result of the actions of private individuals engaged in their private business.

Therefore, when we say importations are made by the United States we state an error. They are made by various persons engaged in commerce in or with the United States, who, in pursuing their private business and endeavoring to build up their own fortunes, make importations according to their own judgment, each man for himself, as to whether it will benefit him or not; and on the other hand, the exportations from the United States are solely sent from the United States by private persons engaged in commerce, who in exporting these goods deem that they will benefit themselves by selling them in a foreign market.

So that this comparison of importations to and exportations from this country is a mere criticism on the part of the Senator from Ohio upon the business methods of private individuals, some in the United States and others in foreign countries, over which we have no power and no control. Certainly it would astonish any American statesman if it was proposed that by direct action of the Government the private individual enterprise and business of our citizens and of foreigners trading with us should be supervised, managed, and controlled.

Now, Mr. President, what constitutes the financial welfare of this country is about this: It is the financial welfare of each individual citizen of this country. He manages his own business. If Mr. A, in New York, imports more into this country than he can pay for, it does not interfere with the prosperity or the financial condition of Mr. B, in Mississippi, who takes care not to buy any more than he can pay for. So that this scarecrow of excess of importation over exportation amounts to nothing more than a criticism by Senators upon the private business transactions of individuals, over which Congress have no control.

Mr. President, allusion has also been made in this debate to various other topics which are now engaging the public mind. We have had criticisms of the civil-service policy of the Administration, and then we have had that ever-fruitful, and it seems ever-recurring topic of debate, the fisheries and the rejected treaty. They have also been lugged into this discussion, and upon them, Mr. President, I desire now to submit some observations.

It seems to me that complaint and criticism, not to say unjust denunciation, have been made against the President for sending in his message in reference to retaliation. Why, sir, when the message was sent in the usual courtesy allowed executive communications of being read was not extended to this paper. Senators desiring to have an opportunity to make criticism upon it adjourned the Senate, and after a night's sleepless anxiety and a night's examination they came in the next morning full of criticism and full of denunciation, not only of the terms of the message, but, it seems to me, of the very fact that the President saw proper to send a message at all.

Early in February the President concluded a treaty of peace—not of peace exactly, but of settlement of difficulties intended to preserve peace and good neighborhood with the British colonies in reference to these fisheries. After many ups and downs, after many turns and changes, after votes one way and then votes another way, after a great deal of deliberation, after a great deal of consultation, it was finally determined, as we all know, that contrary to the universal precedents upon that subject, contrary to the practice of this Government for a hundred years, it was finally determined that this treaty was to be made the subject of a partisan debate in open session.

It was debated for weeks. In that debate charges were made against the Administration that it had failed to discharge its duty to the country in the negotiation of the treaty. Wrongs, outrageous wrongs, alleged to have been perpetrated by the Canadian authorities upon our innocent and unoffending fishermen were debated and dwelt upon with the fervid eloquence of men who seemed to be in earnest, who seemed to be anxious to have one more opportunity of punishing the insolence, the pride, and the injustice of Great Britain. Those of us who favored the ratification of the treaty did not deny these wrongs. We admitted that wrongs had been perpetrated; we admitted that they ought to be corrected; but we contended that that correction ought to be made by negotiation and not by retaliation which might lead to war. We were defeated by a solid vote, without a single exception on the other side of the Chamber. The treaty was rejected, and that, too, under circumstances which meant that no treaty which might be negotiated by the present Administration upon these questions would be ratified.

It was proclaimed, it was announced solemnly by that great committee charged with advising us as to our foreign relations, that the time for negotiation had passed. That sentiment was reiterated in this body, and at last, when the debate was over, when upon a most essential point of the treaty, about the meaning of which there had been debate, a proposition was made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to remove that doubt and to make certain the reading of the treaty so as to make it confer upon the American fishermen most valuable and important rights, that amendment was voted down strictly by a party vote. So that when the President received notice of the rejection of the treaty he had a right to say, as he did say in his message, about which I am now speaking and which I will read for the purpose of putting it on the record here:

> The co-operation necessary for the adjustment of the long standing national differences with which we have to deal, by methods of conference and agreement, having thus been declined, I am by no means disposed to abandon the interests and the rights of our people in the premises or to neglect their grievances.

That was the position which the action of the Senate put the President in. We in effect said, "We will notify you that we will not negotiate." The President and every member on this side of the Chamber who supported his policy acknowledged and felt that great wrong had been perpetrated upon American citizens. That is the way matters stood upon the rejection of the treaty. Every member of this Senate, the President and the Secretary of State all acknowledging, all avowing that great wrongs had been perpetrated and were likely to continue to be perpetrated as things now stand, the Senate refused absolutely to co-operate in providing a modus vivendi by treaty. Then what was the President to do? If the Senate had rejected the treaty upon the ground that there was no necessity for a treaty, that no wrongs were complained of, that all was easy and quiet and nice, everything running smoothly between the American people and the people of Canada, then he might have concluded that he had been mistaken about all this, that it was best to sit down and do nothing. But that was not the notice we served on him. We served on him notice that we had wrongs, grievous wrongs which needed a remedy, but that we would not negotiate for this remedy. We notified him that we deemed any treaty which he could make would be insufficient for the purpose of redress. We would not even consider an amendment to such a treaty. We served notice on him that the time for negotiation had passed, and referring to the act of 1887 we notified him that the policy for the future was to be retaliation.

That is the way the President had a right to interpret our rejection of the treaty. Now, sir, what was the President to do? Looking at the act of 1887 as to the means of retaliation, he found, as I will show, that the means were insufficient both to accomplish our purposes and insufficient as to the grounds upon which retaliation could be made.

It is supposed sometimes, Mr. President, that the act of 1887 authorized the President to make retaliation for any wrong done by any of the Canadian authorities to us. That is not true. It is supposed that his means of retaliation are unlimited. That is not true either.

Before I go into that, however, I desire to call attention to one of the serious objections that have been made to the rejected treaty, made in the very debate occurring on the morning after the President sent in his message. I did not hear in that debate, participated in by the ablest Senators on this floor, any criticism as to what was in the treaty itself. The complaint was as to things that were not in the treaty. It was said that this treaty ought to have been rejected because it did not contain enough, because it did not settle all the disputes and difficulties existing between this country and Great Britain.

That is the burden of the complaint made by all the speakers, and by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] especially. The Senator from Maine called especial attention to the fact that months ago he had called the attention of the Senate to an omission in the treaty in relation to our complaints in reference to the Canadians charging us higher tolls than we were charging them, one of the topics embraced in the message. That was the great ground of his complaint. Did the Senator from Maine know that in the very matter in which he made the complaint of omission it was beyond the power of being settled by negotiation? We already had a treaty upon that subject which was not violated by Great Britain, and which was as strong as the constitution of the British Empire could give us. I make the distinct statement that it was not within the power of the British Government to give us more security, more guaranties, better provisions in relation to the tolls than we already had. We will see what they were.

In the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1871 we find this provision:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages—

To do what? That our vessels should have equal privileges on the canals of Canada? No; Great Britain had no power to make such a treaty. By the local autonomy and constitution of the Dominion Government that was a power existing exclusively in the Dominion of Canada. Here was the engagement that was made by the negotiators and accepted by us:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge—

"Engages to urge"— upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

That is what they engaged to do, and the British Government performed that engagement. I have heard no complaint against the British Government for its failure to urge as it agreed to do. Now let us see what we engaged to do on that subject:

And the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjo the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

We, the United States, own that particular canal, and we accepted from the British Government an engagement to urge upon the Dominion of Canada that they should allow us equal privileges on their canals as a consideration for our promise to give them equal rights and privileges on our canal.

But there were other canals to which the Government of the United States stood in the same relation that the British Government did to the Welland and other canals, and therefore we made a further stipulation.

And further engages—

The United States further engages—to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

So here was a treaty in the twenty-seventh article of which the high contracting parties acknowledge that they have no power with reference to certain canals. The British Government only engages to urge upon the Dominion of Canada to grant us certain rights and we, having one canal, granted them free rights on that and engaged to urge upon the States of this Union to grant the British subjects equal privileges on the others. That is the way this thing stood on that point. There has not been a single complaint made that Great Britain did not comply faithfully with her treaty engagements to urge, and that was all it was bound to do. We knew that; that was the way we made the bargain. In the thirtieth article we took pains to secure redress in case the Dominion of Canada did not accede to this urgent request of the British Government. Let us see what that was. There were various rights granted in the thirtieth article to which I shall allude before I get through, but at the conclusion of that article there is the following stipulation:

The Government of the United States may suspend the right of carrying granted in favor of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty under this article in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII.

We made that bargain with England with our eyes open, the treaty containing a stipulation not that we should have equality on Dominion canals, but that Great Britain should urge upon the Dominion of Canada to grant us those privileges, and in case the urgency of Great Britain should prove unavailing we reserved to ourselves in the thirtieth article of the treaty the means of redress as I have read them.

Mr. President, we have no diplomatic arrangements with Canada; we send no minister there; she sends none here. Great Britain is the treating party. What we get in the way of treaty right in relation to Canada we get from Great Britain, and we got a promise to urge, about which we make no complaint.

But whilst we can not complain of Great Britain for a breach of Article XXVII, as we grant equal tolls and equal privileges to the Canadian vessels if they refuse the right which Great Britain wished us to have, we have a right to retaliate on Canada. So that it would have been the utmost folly for further negotiations to have been carried on between the Government of the United States and Great Britain with reference to these tolls. We already had a treaty on that subject as strong and as binding as Great Britain could make it, and the engagement had been performed by Great Britain. The trouble was that Canada had not performed it. So there was no necessity, as is urged by the Senator from Maine, to have put this matter of free tolls and equality in the canals in the treaty which we have rejected. We could have got but a repetition of the promise which we already had.

But there are various other questions complained of as not having been embraced in the treaty. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said a great deal about that and so did other Senators, as if it was in American politics a just ground for the rejection of a treaty that it did not contain a settlement of questions which are not embraced in it. There have been twenty-seven treaties made between the United States and Great Britain, and every single one of them except one left important questions and disputes between the two governments unsettled. Some of them expressly left them unsettled, others merely omitted them. I make the statement without qualification that up to the recent treaty, of the twenty-seven treaties made and ratified between Great Britain and the United States it never has been urged as a ground of objection to the ratification of any treaty that it did not embrace questions not in the treaty. I propose to review every treaty ever made between the United States and Great Britain and prove this assertion to be true.

First, there was our treaty of independence, the first treaty we ever made with Great Britain. It was made in 1783 and left all commercial matters unsettled between the United States and Great Britain—every one of them—and by the law of nations there was no right except by a treaty for one of our vessels to enter a British port. Everything was left unsettled, although our commissioners were authorized to conclude a commercial treaty as well as a treaty of peace. Yet such men as Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, and John Jay, who were of the commissioners, concluded the treaty of 1783 without a single word in it upon our commercial relations.

The next treaty was made under Washington in 1794. In that treaty the commissioners did undertake to settle some of our commercial relations with Great Britain. Let us see how many they left out. The treaty expressly stipulated in Article XII, that the parties would make new negotiations about the following matters, leaving them all unsettled by that treaty: first, about neutral vessels, covering enemies' property, whether they were to be protected or not in war; and next, about what was contraband. That was in Article XII. In Article XV there was a stipulation that they were to treat further about the more exact equalization of duties as respected their mutual navigation. In Article XXVIII they also agreed to negotiate further, generally, without mentioning the subjects-matter.

That was a treaty made by Washington. It was not urged against the ratification of that treaty that there were these four distinct matters about which there was dispute between Great Britain and the United States which were not settled. But the treaty was ratified, the idea being as it always has been in this country and in all other civilized countries when a treaty is made to get all the good possible out of it, settle all the questions of dispute that can be settled, and leave the rest for future negotiation.

In 1796, in less than two years after the treaty of 1794, Washington still being President, a treaty was made leaving all these questions still unsettled—it merely explaining a provision of the treaty of 1794.

In 1798 another treaty was made explaining the fifth article of the treaty of 1794, leaving all the questions which I have enumerated unsettled, unmentioned, liable to arise at any time to disturb the peace and harmony of the two countries.

In 1802 Thomas Jefferson negotiated a treaty with England, and that was confined merely to explanations of the treaty of 1794, annulling one article of it and confirming another, leaving all the questions to which I have alluded still unsettled, the questions of commerce, contraband, equalization of duties, etc.

The next treaty was in 1814. We had war. The war was ended by this treaty. Our negotiators were Henry Clay, Jonathan Russell, Albert Gallatin, John Quincy Adams, and J. A. Bayard—five of the most distinguished American statesmen.

They left out of that treaty everything about commerce. The commercial treaty of 1794 had been abrogated by the war. The visitation of our ships and the impressment of our seamen by the British, which were the very causes for which we went to war, were wholly unnoticed by the treaty. The navigation of the Mississippi was discussed between the commissioners and omitted from the treaty. The fisheries were discussed between the commissioners and omitted from the treaty. Then there was left unsettled one of the most momentous questions that ever entered into a negotiation as to the effect of the war on all former treaties, England contending that it abolished all former treaties and the United States contending that it did not. That question was left unsettled.

Now, we come to 1815, the very next year. In six months after the treaty of 1814 we had another treaty. It was a treaty of commerce. It left out by express stipulation all regulations about commerce between the United States and the British possessions north of us and the West Indies. All those disturbing questions were thus shoved out of the treaty. The commissioners said, "We can not agree about these things, and they shall be left out."

That was in 1815. Madison was President then. John Quincy Adams, Henry Clay, and Albert Gallatin were the commissioners on the part of the United States.

In 1817 we had another treaty with Great Britain, when the fishery question was up in angry dispute, and the right of impressment was still in dispute and the commercial relations between the United States and the British provinces north of us and the West Indies were all unsettled. That treaty related solely to the naval forces to be placed by each party on the Great Lakes—on Ontario, Erie, etc.

That treaty was negotiated by Mr. Rush, one of the most eminent American diplomatists. Mr. Monroe was President, and John Quincy Adams was Secretary of State.

In 1818 we made the fisheries treaty about which we have had so much trouble. Let us see how much it settled. It treated of the fisheries, the northern boundary of the United States, and claims of the United States for the payment of slaves, and left out everything else. It expressly left for future negotiations the settlement of the Oregon dispute. Gallatin and Rush were the negotiators there, and John Quincy Adams was Secretary of State.

In four years from that time another treaty was made with Great Britain, and it related solely to the carrying out of the arbitration of the Emperor of Russia about the payment for slaves which had been captured by the British during the war of 1812. There was a dispute then between the United States and Great Britain as to the fisheries, for in 1819 the British Parliament had passed an act which asserted the British construction of the treaty of 1818 as to bays. John Quincy Adams was Secretary of State, and Monroe was President.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have the Senator state to what act he refers.

Mr. GEORGE. I refer to the act of the British Parliament in 1819.

Mr. TELLER. Concerning what?

Mr. GEORGE. Concerning the jurisdiction of England over the bays in the British dominions.

Mr. TELLER. Claiming their construction of the treaty of 1818?

Mr. GEORGE. Asserting their jurisdiction over those bays.

Mr. TELLER. Who ever denied their jurisdiction?

Mr. GEORGE. It has been denied all along, I thought. If you give up the jurisdictional question over the bays you give up the whole thing.

Mr. TELLER. They had jurisdiction over the bays subject to our rights. That was all they asserted.

Mr. GEORGE. The question was whether the rights were conceded in those bays. And if they were British bays it was all along conceded that they were not admitted by us to be British bays. I shall not go into that question now, it has been argued over and over again.

In 1826 there was another treaty. The fisheries question as to the construction of the treaty of 1818 was still unsettled. The treaty of 1826 related solely to the award of the Emperor of Russia about slaves. There was no commercial treaty up to that time between us and Great Britain, so far as relates to the Dominion of Canada.

In 1827 we had another treaty. That was about Oregon and nothing else, the treaty expressly stating that other questions were left for future adjustment.

There were three treaties in the year 1827. I have called your attention to the first treaty. Now I will call your attention to the second treaty. It continued in force for ten years longer the treaty of 1815, and that is all it did, leaving unsettled all the questions I have specified. Albert Gallatin was the commissioner who negotiated that treaty; John Quincy Adams was President of the United States and Mr. Clay was Secretary of State.

The third treaty in the year 1827 between Great Britain and the United States related solely to the northeastern boundary; everything else was left out.

General Jackson does not seem to have made any treaties with England; neither did Mr. Van Buren; but whoever has paid any attention to the debate on the treaty will remember that in 1836 the Government of Nova Scotia passed some very rigid statutes about these fisheries and enforced them with great rigor. There was a lieutenant of the Navy sent by us up there to see about this, and there was correspondence between Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Stevenson, and an attempt was made to settle the difficulty. That occurred from 1836 up to 1842, when we were in this state of trouble and harassment in reference to the treaty rights.

We had a treaty with Great Britain in 1842, negotiated by Daniel Webster. That treaty related to the northeastern boundary, to the extradition of criminals, to the navigation of the St. John's River, the Detroit River, the St. Lawrence River, and the slave trade, taking in a pretty broad field of diplomatic action. Yet with all that dispute, because it had grown up then and become flagrant between England and the United States in reference to the Canadian fisheries and our fishing rights and the meaning of the treaty of 1818, not one word was said on that subject in the treaty of 1842. No American statesman, no member of the United States Senate, got up and opposed the ratification of that treaty because it did not settle the burning questions then existing between the two countries. It was ratified. That was under President Tyler, with Mr. Webster as the Secretary of State and the negotiator. Mr. Webster negotiated the treaty himself with Lord Ashburton, who was here at the time.

In 1846 we had another treaty, and that settled the boundary of Oregon. All this trouble about the fisheries was then flagrant. The British had seized the Washington out many miles from the shore in the Bay of Fundy. They were pressing to the extremest extent their view that we had no commercial rights. Nobody objected to that treaty. They did not have any debate in open session. There was no Presidential election on hand. There was nothing to be made by badgering the British lion. There was nothing to be made by exciting the prejudices and the animosities of any portion of our people against England. Yet with all these burning questions then existing not one word was said about them.

In 1846 Mr. Polk was President. The treaty of that year settled the boundary of Oregon and left out the fisheries and all the commercial arrangements with Canada, about which the country had been in a fever of excitement for ten years, at least from the year 1836.

That treaty was negotiated by Mr. Buchanan under Mr. Polk. For fear that my friends upon the other side will not regard that as the best authority, I will state that Daniel Webster was a member of the Senate, and that he and every single Northern Whig in the Senate, and every single Southern Whig voted for the ratification of the treaty. They did not get up here and say "We will not have this matter settled because we can not have everything settled." They followed the rule of American diplomatists, to get all they can fairly settled, to get a treaty right wherever they can and leave the rest for the future.

Now we come to 1850, when we had another treaty with Great Britain. Things were pretty hot about the fishery matters in 1850. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to my statement. I think about 1850 there was a great debate in the Senate of the United States on the subject.

Mr. GRAY. That was in 1852.

Mr. GEORGE. Still things were hot about the fisheries. Then we had the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, with the fisheries, commerce, navigation, and relations with Canada all left out, no attempt having been made to settle anything but one single question. General Taylor was President and John M. Clayton, of Delaware, was Secretary of State and negotiated the treaty.

Then in 1853 we had a treaty for the settlement of claims. Both Mr. Fillmore and Mr. Pierce are responsible for that treaty, because it was concluded under Mr. Fillmore February 8, 1853, and was ratified under Mr. Pierce March 17, 1853. J. R. Ingersoll was the negotiator; W. L. Marcy was the Secretary of State when the treaty was ratified. Yet no American Senator got up and said, as is proclaimed here: "We shall not vote for that treaty because there are outstanding disputes between Great Britain and the United States which are not settled."

In 1854 we had another treaty. That was the reciprocity treaty with Canada, and it settled nothing else.

In the same year we had another treaty—two treaties in the same year—merely extending the duration of a commission which had been provided for by a former treaty.

Now we come down a good long step. The next treaty was July 2, 1862, Mr. Lincoln being President and Mr. Seward Secretary of State. There were several burning questions in 1862 between the United States and Great Britain. There was the question of the recognition of the belligerent rights of the Southern States, and there were other questions; and yet that was a treaty confined solely to the suppression of the African slave-trade.

Then in 1863 we had another treaty, Mr. Lincoln being President. All these burning questions about belligerent rights and privateers and Alabamas and Floridas and all that sort of thing were ignored, and the treaty merely added another article to the slave-trade treaty of 1862.

There was another treaty with Great Britain in 1863, with Mr. Lincoln President. That treaty related to claims; and as the two countries were settling the claims of the citizens of Great Britain against the United States there was the chance to have brought in the Alabama and privateering claims, but not a word was said about them. That treaty settled the claims of the Hudson Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Companies against the United States, and nothing else. The treaty was ratified by the Senate January 18, 1864, almost at the end of the war, after the battle of Gettysburgh, after it was seen by everybody that the life of the Confederate States was to be but a short one.

Yet no American Senator, much less a majority of this body, got up and denounced that treaty because it did not settle all the claims and all the questions existing between the United States and Great Britain.

There were no treaties under Andrew Johnson.

We come now to 1870. The war was over. General Grant was President of the United States. Mr. Fish was Secretary of State. Then the Alabama claims and all the privateering business were flush and fresh. What was done in 1870? As the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] says, there were then a great many fishery troubles, and I shall show that also from President Grant's message.

In December, 1870, General Grant sent a message to the Congress of the United States, in which the wrongs of the fishermen were pressed with great vigor. Yet, on May 13, 1870, there was a treaty of naturalization. That was all. There was not a word about fisheries, not a word about the Alabama claims, not a word about any of the disputes which then existed, and there were many, between the United States and Great Britain.

June 3, 1870, General Grant made another treaty with Great Britain, and that related to the African slave trade alone. Nothing was said about all these burning questions.

We are getting on right close to the great reciprocity treaty of 1871. May 5, 1871, General Grant proclaimed another treaty of 1871, about naturalization. Mr. Fish was the Secretary of State and the negotiator. Nothing was said about the Alabama claims, or about any other troubles that we had with that country.

July 4, 1871, came the only treaty ever made between the United States and Great Britain which professed on its face to settle all the questions between the United States and that country. It has given rise to more questions than were settled by it. That was the treaty for the settlement of the Alabama claims, the fisheries, and reciprocity, and all that sort of thing for a period of years.

Yet with all these twenty-seven treaties, every one of them, except one, partial, leaving out important questions unsettled, some of them expressly stating that the parties would negotiate further as to unsettled questions, not a single American Senator or American statesman ever objected to one of them because it did not settle all. It was reserved for the year 1888, pending a Presidential election, for an American Senate in open session, in violation of the precedents of the body, to make that objection to the ratification of a treaty for the first time in the history of the country.

Mr. GRAY. Would the Senator from Mississippi object to an interruption?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, in the line of the argument he is making, that between the years 1869 and the ratification of the treaty of Washington in 1871 there were more seizures and forfeitures of American fishing vessels than occurred between the abrogation of that treaty in 1885 and the negotiation of the treaty which has just been rejected by the Senate. The Senator can confirm my statement, as he is on that subject now. I believe that in the treaty of 1871 no provision at all was made looking towards the settlement of the damages claimed by the fishermen whose vessels had been seized and forfeited.

Mr. GEORGE. The treaty of 1871 does not contain a single provision on that subject, unless I have overlooked it. Unless I am corrected by some Senator on the other side or on this side who is more familiar with it than I am, I will repeat the statement made by the Senator from Delaware, that there is not a single provision in the treaty of 1871 for what we call indemnity for past wrongs. All look to the future.

Now, Mr. President, I think that disposes of that subject. Remember what I stated in the former part of my remarks, that the question which the President names in his message as a subject of retaliation, that is, as to the tolls, is not a matter which can be settled by negotiation with Great Britain any better than has been done already. All that Great Britain can do in reference to it is to engage to urge upon Canada to grant this equality, as the United States on their part engage to urge upon the States of the Union to grant equality to Canadian vessels on their canals.

So, you see, Mr. President, how hollow, how utterly without foundation is that objection to the treaty, and how vain it is to claim that the President erred when he brought that matter before the Senate in his message asking additional powers for retaliation. The case stood exactly this way when the President sent in his message: "We can not settle this wrong by negotiation. We have already a treaty upon that subject. We have no cause of complaint against Great Britain, the party to that treaty, for any failure on her part. She has made the recommendation to Canada, and the fault is with a party we can not reach by negotiation. There are and can be no diplomatic arrangements or communications between Canada, a dependent of the British Empire, and the United States, any more than there can be between the State of Maryland and Great Britain."

The treaty failed. Notice was served on the President that we would not negotiate; that we would not co-operate with the executive department. Here were the wrongs, wrongs about the fisheries and wrongs about the canals. The President necessarily turned to retaliation, the only thing left us.

As to treaties, you may carve out your questions and settle them year by year or treaty by treaty, but it is an unheard-of thing when you commence to retaliate that you leave a part of your wrongs which demand retaliation for a second act of retaliation. Retaliation is not done by piecemeal. Retaliation is quasi war—initiative, leading to war. Would it not be a most unheard-of thing for a nation to go to war with another with a list of grievances and select out four or five of those and go to war upon them? So, when you come to retaliate there is a difference between that and negotiation. Retaliation is the act of one party; negotiation is the act of two. You must have the consent of two to make a treaty, but when you come to retaliate it is the act of one. Retaliation is the act of the injured party or the party supposing itself to be injured, and of course if there is to be retaliation it ought to cover all the wrongs complained of between the two countries; and it ought also to be thorough, adequate, and efficient.

That brings me to the next question, and that is whether the act of 1887 is a sufficient retaliatory act. I say it is not. I say, first, that it does not cover all the grounds we have for retaliation; that is, there are wrongs committed by the Canadians against us for which the President can not put the act of 1887 in force. One of those wrongs is the very one mentioned by the President of the United States in his message, the inequality of tolls in the Canadian canals. Now, let us see what the act of 1887 is. It provides—

That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen visiting, etc.

Of course this question does not come under any clause of the act of 1887, which relates to American fishing vessels or American fishermen, because it is a question of tolls on commercial vessels, on the Welland and other canals, hundreds of miles from any fishing station or grounds.

Now we go to another clause of the act of 1887. Here is a clause that refers to all American fishing vessels. Let us see what it is:

Or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States—

That embraces all—their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied—

What? Any treaty rights? No—any of the privileges therein—

That is, in such port—accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation.

We can not make out a case for retaliation in that unless we can show what does not exist, that other nations have superior rights to us in those canals, and that is not complained of. The complaint is that we have not the same rights there that the Canadians have.

So under the act there is no place to put in operation the retaliation authorized by it upon a failure of the Canadian Government to carry out the recommendation of the British Government made in the treaty of 1871 to give our vessels equality with the Canadian vessels as to tolls in the Dominion canals.

Therefore, if we want to retaliate about this unjust discrimination as between the Canadian vessels and our own in tolls, we must have an additional act of Congress. That is not one of the cases, it is not a casus talionis mentioned in the act of 1887, under which and by which the President can put that act into operation; nor when it is put into operation can he continue it until redress is had in reference to that matter. So the President's message contained a recommendation which must be adopted by Congress or we must abandon the claim of our vessels to equal tolls in the Dominion canals.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator know of any reason why Canadian vessels can not be kept out of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, or why a toll can not be levied on all Canadian vessels that do pass through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal?

Mr. GEORGE. Is that the St. Clair Flats Canal?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it is the big canal which is probably used as much as any other by the Canadians in the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. That canal is not mentioned in the treaty of 1871?

Mr. FRYE. It is not.

Mr. GEORGE. It is in the United States?

Mr. FRYE. It is in the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. It was built since 1871?

Mr. FRYE. It is one of the most important canals there are in the world, I suppose.

Mr. GEORGE. If there is no law of Congress which gives Canadian vessels privileges, they must depend for their right in that canal only on the treaty. There is no reason why there should not be a treaty, but there may be acts of Congress to which my attention has not been called.

Mr. FRYE. There are no acts of Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. If there is no act of Congress, I will turn to the treaty of 1871.

Mr. FRYE. No; it is not mentioned in the treaty. That is why I asked the Senator the question. When he says the President can not retaliate in any way I ask the question whether there is anything in law or treaty to prevent our levying a toll or stopping entirely the Canadians from going through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal?

Mr. GEORGE. That is just one canal, but then there are the others they could go through. A little partial retaliation amounts to nothing. If you have retaliation let us have it adequate and efficient.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Senator if he knows that there has been a bill for retaliation on this very subject pending before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the House of Representatives for the last two or three months?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know it, but it shows that the subject requires legislation. Because there is a bill pending in the House of Representatives and not passed and not acted upon, that is no reason why the President should not ask the Congress of the United States to pass an act on that subject. On the contrary, instead of being a reason for his not doing it the negligence of the House on that subject is a sufficient reason, and the greater negligence of the Senate too, because we have not even gone so far as to introduce the bill. That is a good reason why the President should call our attention to it and urge action.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator another question. Whether he is aware that Sir John MacDonald——

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, I do not know anything about Sir John MacDonald. Please let me off on Sir John.

Mr. FRYE. He is the head of the Canadian Government. I ask the Senator whether he knows that Sir John MacDonald declares that there is no discrimination against us in those canals?

Mr. GEORGE. I can not find anything about that canal in the treaty of 1871, but there is the other one mentioned; and then there are State canals and all that sort of thing over which we have no jurisdiction.

Now, Mr. President, I have proven the necessity for the passage of an act. I presume when the Senator from Maine and every other Senator will look critically at the act of 1887 they will see that this toll business is not one of the cases under which and through which and on which the President of the United States can institute any act of retaliation under the act of 1887. We must settle the question now as to the events or contingencies under which the act of 1887 may be put in force. Now let us see what can be done when it is put in force. I was calling the attention of the Senate to the means of redress or the acts of retaliation which the President was authorized to take or use under the act of 1887. I had shown before that as to one, and that a very grave cause of complaint, that is, the inequality of the tolls levied by the Dominion of Canada—that act of 1887 provided no means of redress for that wrong, that is, it could not be put into operation—the retaliatory measure provided in the act of 1887 could not be put into operation on account of that wrong. I now desire to show what means of redress are provided for by the act of 1887 for the difficulties to which I have before alluded which exclude the inequality of tolls. The act authorizes the doing of these things and no more:

First. To deny entrance to any vessels of the British Dominion to our ports.

Second. To deny entrance to fish or any product of said Dominion.

Third. To deny entrance to any other goods coming from said Dominion to the United States.

The President may apply this denial to any part or to all of the above, but that is all he can do. He can not, as has been asserted on this floor, do any more than this. He can not deny the right of transit over American territory to goods coming from foreign countries going into Canada. Therefore this measure that the President asks for is not allowed by present law.

I will read from President Grant's message of 1870, to show that he regarded the identical measure recommended by the President as a most efficient means of retaliation on Canada. In that message, dated 5th day of December, 1870, President Grant, after making complaint against the Canadian authorities for their treatment of our fishing vessels, uses this language as to the mode of redress:

Anticipating—

Said President Grant—

that an attempt may possibly be made by the Canadian authorities in the coming season to repeat their unneighborly acts toward our fishermen, I recommend you to confer upon the Executive the power to suspend, by proclamation, the operation of the laws authorizing the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across the territory of the United States to Canada; and further, should such an extreme measure become necessary, to suspend the operation of any laws whereby the vessels of the Dominion of Canada are permitted to enter the waters of the United States.

So that President Grant recommended the very thing that President Cleveland recommends in his message now before the Senate, and he recommends it, too, in addition to the measures which are provided for in the act of 1887. That act provides for the suspension of the operation of any laws whereby the vessels of the Dominion of Canada were permitted to enter the waters of the United States. So President Grant, in the exercise of his duty to recommend to Congress such measures as he deemed the public welfare demanded, has recommended the exact thing which President Cleveland recommends in the message now under consideration.

Thursday, August 30, 1888.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in the argument which I have had the honor to submit to the Senate I have endeavored to prove, and I think I have proven, that there are wrongs committed by the Canadian authorities against the people of the United States which do not fall within the retaliatory clauses of the act of 1887. I have also endeavored to show, and I think I have shown, that for these wrongs the means of retaliation provided for by that act are insufficient. I proved that by the consideration of the terms of the act of 1887, and I have also proven by the message of President Grant, dated December 5, 1870, in which he recommended the very retaliatory measure, almost in the same words, recommended by the President, that these two eminent Presidents on this subject occupy precisely the same ground.

It is alleged, however, that there are other means of retaliation in the power of the President not embraced in the act of 1887. I deny that. One of the Senators who took this position is the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. I read from his speech delivered August 24, in which he says that Congress took the view—

That if Great Britain, the treaty being in force, violated it on her side and denied to us a right that we had under it, we were no longer under any obligation to grant to her a right that she had under it.

To which proposition I agree. But the Senator proceeded further:

And it did not need a statute to do that. There are gentlemen within the hearing of my voice now who have occupied positions as Cabinet ministers of Presidents of the United States, there are others who have not who have been students of public law, and my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] I can appeal to as one of the best of them, and they know that when one nation having a treaty with another chooses to break it or to refuse or refrain from carrying it into reciprocal and equal effect, the other nation is no longer bound; and it is at the option of her Executive, whose business it is to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and that nothing else is executed, shall stand up for the rights of the nation that is thus wronged, just as the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] did under a treaty with some power of whom we are now speaking, who told them that if they chose to put a certain interpretation upon that treaty then he would regard it, under the direction of the President of the United States, as an end of the treaty.

So I understand the proposition of the Senator from Vermont to be that if there be a violation of any treaty rights which we have under the treaty of 1871, it is competent for the President of his own motion, without any action of Congress, to declare the treaty at an end, and to deny to the other side rights secured to them under the treaty. This proposition I deny; it has no foundation in American constitutional law. I say both by the speculation and the writings of our eminent statesmen and by the acts of Congress themselves this assumed or alleged power stated thus by the Senator from Vermont to be in the President of the United States is shown not to exist. That power rests solely in the Congress of the United States.

The first authority I shall read in contravention of the position taken by the Senator from Vermont is from a very high authority, Mr. Madison, who says:

Treaties, as I understand the Constitution, are made supreme over the constitutions and laws of the particular States, and, like a subsequent law of the United States, over pre-existing laws of the United States; provided, however, that the treaty be within the prerogative of making treaties, which, no doubt, has certain limits.

That the contracting powers can annul the treaty can not, I presume, be questioned, the same authority precisely being exercised in annulling as in making a treaty.

That a breach on one side (even of a single article, each being considered as a condition of every other article) discharges the other is as little questionable, but with this reservation, that the other side is at liberty to take advantage or not of the breach as dissolving the treaty. Hence I infer that the treaty with Great Britain, which has not been annulled by mutual consent, must be regarded as in full force by all on whom its execution in the United States depends, until it shall be declared by the party, to whom a right has accrued by the breach of the other party to declare, that advantage is to be taken of the breach, and the treaty is annulled accordingly. In case it should be advisable to take advantage of the adverse breach, a question may perhaps be started, whether the power vested by the Constitution with respect to treaties in the President and Senate makes them—

That is the President and the Senate—

the competent judges, or whether, as the treaty is a law, the whole legislature are to judge of its annulment, or whether, in case the President and Senate be competent in ordinary treaties, the legislative authority be requisite to annul a treaty of peace, as being equivalent to a declaration of war, to which that authority alone, by our Constitution, is competent.

Mr. MORGAN. From what do you read?

Mr. GEORGE. I am reading from a letter of Mr. Madison to Mr. Edmund Pendleton, dated January 2, 1791, contained in Wharton's Digest of International Law, section 138.

It will be seen that Mr. Madison, in discussing who is to determine the breach of a treaty and the release from its obligations of the United States on account of this breach, alludes to two parties only as competent to declare the breach and the release. One is the President and the Senate. As they made the treaty it has been argued that they may annul it. That is one of the competent authorities which he says possibly might, as some allege, have the power. But that power is disputed as between them and the Congress of the United States upon the firm ground that the treaty, being the supreme law of the land, can not be annulled except by making another law which annuls it. These are the only two authorities which under our Constitution, according to Mr. Madison, can by any possibility lay claim to this power. No one then pretended that the President alone had the power.

There is no express power vested by the Constitution of the United States in the President and Senate to simply annul a treaty. The power granted to them by the Constitution is to make a treaty. Of course in the exercise of their power of making treaties they may abrogate all former treaties or any part of former treaties between the United States and the particular government with which they make the new treaty, but that results not from their power to declare a treaty annulled for a breach of its conditions, because that is not given to them by the Constitution, but it results from their power to make a new treaty which can only be made by the consent of the other nation, and thus by mutual consent abrogating a contract already existing between the parties.

So, then, we are remitted to the other alternative presented by Mr. Madison, and that is that Congress may annul it, and why? Upon the admitted ground recognized by numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, a subsequent act of Congress in conflict with a prior treaty annuls the treaty to the extent of the conflict and itself becomes the supreme law of the land instead of the law made by the former treaty.

Mr. President, I think then the learned Senator from Vermont grievously erred in asserting to the Senate that the autocratic power was vested in the President of the United States by the Constitution of the United States to annul, to change, to abrogate a supreme law of the land by his own individual action. No such power is granted to him by the Constitution. We have some precedents as to the abrogation of treaties by the United States on the alleged ground of their violation by the other party. I call the attention of the Senate to the only act on our statute-books, the only act existing in the history of this country so far as I have been able to learn—and I have searched with some diligence—by which the United States undertook of their own motion, without consulting the adverse party, to annul and abrogate an existing treaty upon the ground that the other party had violated it. If there be any other instance it has escaped my observation. This instance is the act of Congress of July 7, 1798, which I will read to the Senate as showing the earliest construction of the power of the Constitution with reference to the abrogation of treaties by the single act of the United States, made at an early day when the great statesmen who formed the Constitution itself were controlling the councils of this nation:

Whereas the treaties concluded between the United States and France have been repeatedly violated on the part of the French Government, and the just claims of the United States for reparation of the injuries so committed have been refused, and their attempts to negotiate an amicable adjustment of all complaints between the two nations have been repelled with indignity; and

Whereas, under authority of the French Government, there is yet pursued against the United States a system of predatory violence, infracting the said treaties, and hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States are of right freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties, and of the consular convention, heretofore concluded between the United States and France; and that the same shall not henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States.

This is the only instance, so far as my researches extend, where the United States ever undertook to decide for themselves that they were no longer bound by a treaty with a foreign country on account of the failure of that country to observe its provisions. That was done by an act of Congress approved by Mr. Adams in 1798, and from that time to this there has not been the assumption of power by any President of the United States to annul a treaty upon his mere belief that the other side had not complied with it. That disposes of that question, I think.

So any remedy we might have arising under such a construction of the Constitution does not exist, but other remedies are pointed out by distinguished Senators as existing over and above and outside of the act of 1887. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] claimed—and I will read his claim, so that the Senate may understand it:

I do not propose to add anything to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on that subject, nor to express any opinion of my own in regard to it at the present time.

The President claims that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 has been abrogated, and that each nation therefore is at liberty without further negotiation, if it shall see fit, to proceed to regulate its own conduct in reference to this subject-matter of complaint without regard to any binding obligation of one toward the other. Very well; if that be true, then the Administration has all this time—and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this proposition—had absolute power and control and discretion over the whole matter. The authority which the President asks, so far as it relates to the transporting of Canadian goods in bond over our railways or canals, or so far as stopping the employment of Canadian railroads and canals by our shippers of goods, is already complete.

He bases that on two sections of the Revised Statutes. He had this read:

SEC. 3005. All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland in Maine, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel in Texas, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed, in transit, through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Section 3006 read in connection with this I will notice hereafter.

It will be noted in the first instance, a point that has been overlooked in this debate, that section 3005 of the Revised Statutes refers only to importations into Canada through the United States. It does not refer to exportations. There is no authority in section 3005 for a transshipment through the United States of goods from Canada and destined for other countries than the United States. That authority is found elsewhere in our statutes passed prior to the enactment of that section.

So, then, if section 3005 could be construed as giving any power whatever to the President in relation to this matter, it could not be construed as giving any power over exportations from Canada, and the stopping of exports is about as important as the prevention of imports. But, sir, section 3005 is a statute of the United States. It is absolute in its terms. It does not propose or profess to have any force or vitality contingent upon any reciprocal right granted or to be granted by Canada or upon any act to be performed by Canada. It is absolute, and there is no power in that section 3005, no provision, which authorizes the President to suspend its operation upon any cause or for any purpose whatever. So, if the President of the United States were to undertake to suspend the operation of section 3005 he would assume the autocratic power denied to him by the Constitution and possessed only by the most despotic autocrat in Europe or in Asia—a power to suspend or abrogate a statute absolute in its terms without in any sense being made contingent or dependent on his will.

But the Senator from Massachusetts, as I understand his argument, bases the right of the President of the United States to suspend the operation of section 3005 upon the effect of these terms used in the statute, that this transportation may be "without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

That is the groundwork of the argument, based upon a provision in the statute, which is very common, allowing the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to foreign commerce to make regulations for its orderly conduct. That argument is based on the assumption that the power given to regulate a certain transaction, which is made lawful and permitted by the statute, includes in it the power to prohibit absolutely the doing of the transaction at all.

When a statute is passed making legal the performance of a particular transaction under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the power is claimed for the Secretary of the Treasury to prohibit the doing of the thing for the proper doing of which he was authorized to make regulations. As I am informed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], who sits at my right, and who is very familiar with all these things, three-fourths of the statutes of the United States regulating foreign commerce and internal revenue provide for regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senator from Massachusetts seems to have discovered that this argument would not of itself do, and so he also relies on section 3006 to make it good. That section is as follows:

SEC. 3006. Imported merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces or Republic of Mexico, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein, over the territory of such provinces or Republic, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from such provinces or Republic, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

That section relates simply to the coastwise trade of the United States, the shipment starting from a port in the United States and ending in another port in the United States, and the only difference between that and the ordinary coastwise trade is the permission given in this statute that a part of the transportation may be over foreign territory. So under section 3006, intended to provide alone for the regulation of the coastwise trade of the United States, that is, transportation from one port in the United States to another port in the United States, the extraordinary result is reached that the President may prohibit the transportation over our territory of goods, not from one port to another in the United States, but from one foreign country to another through the United States! The Senator from Massachusetts proceeds:

My proposition is that the transportation of merchandise coming from American railroads or canals or other modes of carriage through Canada is, by section 3006 of the Revised Statutes, to be conducted under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the moment the Administration was informed that this discrimination—

That is as I suppose about the tolls—was made by Canada against our interests, the President had the right instantly to interpose and put an end to the entire traffic at once—just what he asks the special authority of Congress to do at the present time.

Suppose he had power under this section, what traffic could he put an end to? Transportation from Canada to a foreign country? Transportation from a foreign country to Canada? No; but transportation entirely between two ports of the United States, as from Buffalo in New York or Oswego in New York to Chicago in Illinois. That is a very remarkable proposition; and the Senator from Massachusetts seems to have thought that it was necessary to support it by authority, and he produced two circulars of the Treasury Department for this authority. The Senator from Massachusetts claims that this very power asked for by the President, which is a power to prevent goods coming from England, for instance, or France destined for Canada going through the United States to Canada, or goods coming from Canada destined for England or France and going through the United States—he claims that this power has been asserted by the President and Secretary Manning in two circulars, which he read to the Senate. Now let us see. He read first circular 102, dated July 2, 1885:

CIRCULAR.

TERMINATION OF CERTAIN ARTICLES OF THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

[1885. Department No. 102. Division of Special Agents.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1885.

To collectors of customs:

Notice having been given by the proclamation of the President, dated January 31, 1885, of the abrogation—

Of what? Article XXIX, which authorizes this transportation from Canada to France through the United States? No; but—

of Articles XVIII to XXV—

Which are the fishery articles—and Article XXX of the treaty of Washington—

Which was the article admitting the British to our coastwise trade. But I proceed with reading the circular:

collectors of customs are hereby notified that article 844 of the Customs Regulations of 1884, which is identical with article 19 of the Regulations of March 30, 1875, made pursuant to—

To what? Pursuant to Article XXIX, which I will read in a few moments, which he says the Secretary understood was abrogated? No; but—

pursuant to Article XXX—

It has no more to do with the transportation of exports from Canada to Europe or from Europe to Canada across the United States than it has to do with the transportation of goods from Liverpool to Hong-Kong. The circular goes on—I have read the ground or reason for the issuing of the circular—

Article XXX of said treaty, will cease to be in force from and after this date.

Shipments of merchandise in transit from one port or place within the territory of the United States—to another, by a route a part of which is by land carriage through the Dominion of Canada, and a part by the Great Lakes and the rivers connecting the same, or by the river St. Lawrence, in either British or American vessels, from ports on the northern frontier of the United States to ports on the Canadian frontier for transshipment to railway cars, and from points on the Canadian frontier, at the termini of railway transportation, to ports on the northern frontier of the United States, will hereafter be treated in all respects as ordinary importations from foreign contiguous territory.

Following exactly the provision of Article XXX—

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate and the attention of the country to the fact that in the recitals of the trade or navigation about which this regulation is made the Secretary follows almost verbatim Article XXX and has no reference to Article XXIX. But I will read from the Senator from Massachusetts his comment on that:

Now, it will be seen that the Secretary of the Treasury, conceiving at the time that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 was terminated—

Yet there is no reference in the circular to Article XXIX, and what is more, there is no reference in the circular to any operation of commerce authorized by Article XXIX. It refers solely to operations of commerce authorized by Article XXX. I will go back and read this comment all over again so as to do the Senator no injustice:

Now, it will be seen that the Secretary of the Treasury, conceiving at the time that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 was terminated, instantly exercised his authority under the statute of 1866, re-enacted by the Revised Statutes as section 3006, and declared that all merchandise coming from Canada as a part of the joint transportation routes should be subject to the ordinary customs duties, showing the opinion of the President and the Secretary who was the head of his Treasury Department that he possessed the ample power to accomplish this thing.

Well, now, there is not a single reference in this circular to any commercial transaction or transportation which could take place under Article XXIX. The circular is based expressly in terms, on its face, on the fact that Article XXX had been abrogated, and it refers alone to commercial and navigation operations which were authorized not by Article XXIX but by Article XXX. It makes no reference to any sort of operation which was legalized or authorized by Article XXIX, and what is more remarkable in this argument is the language which I shall now repeat from the Senator's remarks:

—instantly exercised his authority under the statute of 1866, re-enacted by the Revised Statutes as section 3006.

The act of 1866, section 3006 of the Revised Statutes, as I have stated and as is plain on its face, has reference only to the coastwise trade of the United States where the goods start from one port in the United States and land at another port in the United States, on their way, however, going through Canada. It has no reference whatever to a shipment or a transportation starting from Canada, as is specified in Article XXIX, intended for Europe, or Africa, or Asia, or South America, or anywhere else, which needs simply to go through the United States from its port of departure in Canada to its port of destination in one of these foreign countries. That is the argumentation, that is the clear authority on which this Senate, having committed itself to reject all further negotiation, having committed itself to right our wrongs by retaliation, is asked to deny the just power asked for by the President to make effective retaliation, following exactly the example set by President Grant in 1870.

There was an error in the circular I have just read; there was a mistake made by the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to the coastwise trade of the United States, provided for in Article XXX and also sanctioned by our statutes. The Secretary of the Treasury forgot that the only power to make this coastwise trade through Canada did not come from Article XXX. He forgot that there was a statute of the United States which authorized any American vessels—not any British vessels, as provided for in Article XXX, as well as American vessels, but only American vessels—to convey goods from one port to another in the United States through Canada. So in this circular, intended to forbid all operations under Article XXX, the Secretary went too far in prohibiting the transportation of goods from Oswego, for instance, to Chicago, where it went a part of the way through Canada over the Welland Canal and in American vessels as well as British vessels. Article XXX gave the right to carry on this trade to both British and American vessels. The statute which remained in force after Article XXX was abrogated by the notice given for that purpose gave the right only to American vessels. In a few days thereafter, discovering his mistake, he issued the other circular, which the Senator from Massachusetts commented on and claimed to have been an exercise by the President of the very power which he asks Congress to grant to him. I will read that:

CIRCULAR.

[Department No. 116. Division of special agents.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 24, 1885.

To collectors and other officers of customs:

Under the authority contained in section 3006 of the Revised Statutes, imported merchandise, in bond or duty paid, and products and manufactures of the United States, may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces, be transported from one port in—Canada to a foreign country, as is argued here and is the very question before the Senate? No, sir; but—from one port in the United States to another port therein over the territory of such provinces, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Therefore, so much of Circular No. 102 of this Department, dated the 2d instant, as rescinded article 844 of the Customs Regulations of 1884 is revoked, and said article is hereby amended in such manner as to restrict the transportation therein referred to to American vessels. Customs officers will be governed accordingly.

The salaries of officers stationed in Canada to supervise transshipment from vessels to cars, and vice versa, must be reimbursed to the Government by the transportation companies interested.

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

This, sir, is the law under which the Senator from Massachusetts claims this power of the President, and these are the two constructions of this law which he claims have been made by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, asserting the power which the President now asks for; and that is the unstable foundation upon which that claim is based.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another important question, and one which several Senators on the other side said was the main question, and that is whether Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 is now in force or not. The President claims that Article XXIX fell with Article XXX and the articles from XVIII to XXV, inclusive. I wish the Senate to understand that the sole point here is whether this Article XXIX is in force or not.

Of course we can abrogate article XXIX if we see proper to do so by an act of Congress, but if it is in force and we abrogate it by virtue of a Congressional act, then this results, and this wide difference exists between abrogating it by an act of Congress and acting as if it were not in force, it being in fact not in force. In the extract which I read from Mr. Madison some time ago we find a very clear statement made of the law upon the subject, that where there is a breach of one part of a compact between two parties there is a breach of all, and if the party against whose rights the breach is made takes advantage of it he does not take this advantage by abrogating the particular article of the treaty which he complains has been violated, but he abrogates all the compact. If there is anything settled in international law it is that if you proceed for the annulment of a treaty upon the ground that some substantial provision in that treaty has been violated by the other party the annulment goes to the extent of annulling the whole treaty and not any particular article in it.

You are not allowed to say upon a breach of a substantial treaty right, "I acknowledge all this treaty to be in force except just this part, and as to that I annul it." The language I read from Mr. Madison was that each provision of the treaty was a condition of every other provision of the treaty, so that if there be a breach in one part there is a breach in all parts, and if there be an annulment in one part there is an annulment in all parts. So this important thing, or this important right, or this important consequence arises for the consideration of the Senate, whether we proceed to annul the treaty of 1871 for a violation of Article XXIX or whether we, being right on the true construction of the treaty, declare that Article XXIX has been abrogated by the terms of the treaty itself. In the first hypothesis if we declare the treaty annulled we lose every unexecuted and unvested right in it.

There are provisions in that treaty of a very important character to the American people about which no complaint has been made. There are navigation rights with respect to great rivers which still stand in the treaty unaffected if Article XXIX is abrogated, in pursuance of the treaty itself, and which will be lost if we take it upon ourselves to decide not that Article XXIX has already been abrogated in pursuance of the provisions of the treaty, but that it having been violated by England or by Canada we declare the whole treaty void.

That is a sound principle of international law. So it makes a very great difference whether we proceed by virtue of the power—I might call it a physical power—of the Congress of the United States to declare that the treaty of 1871 shall no longer be binding upon us because Article XXIX has been violated, or whether we are able to make out justly, truly, and according to the provisions of the treaty of 1871, that the article has fallen. The President takes this just distinction in his message. In recommending to us to repeal the laws which authorize the transit of Canadian goods across our territory he states to us that we are not in doing so restrained by any provision of treaty, we are not violating any treaty, we are not setting aside any treaty, we are not declaring that any part of a treaty has been violated by England and therefore we abrogate the whole treaty, but we are acting in pursuance of the treaty itself.

That brings us to the discussion of the question whether or not Article XXIX, not having been abrogated by an act of Congress, remains in force to-day as a part of the treaty of 1871 and as a part of the supreme law of the land. To that I propose to address myself, and in order that the Senate and the country may understand exactly the argument which I make upon that subject, I will call the attention of the Senate again to the provisions of that article. I read now Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, to see what it provides for. That article reads:

It is agreed—

Perpetually? No. Indefinitely? No. But—

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may from time to time be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

The President wants as a just and effective act of retaliation to stop that; he wants to stop this transportation—that is the power he asks us to give—both to Canada from foreign countries through the United States and from Canada through the United States to foreign countries, and that is the provision.

The first thing that strikes one who reads this article is that on its face it is limited in its operation to a term of years not mentioned in the article itself, but a term of years mentioned in some other article—Article XXXIII.

So we start out now with this plain proposition settled that this article is not perpetual; it is not an agreement for an indefinite period of time. It is a treaty limited, so far as Article XXIX is concerned, in express words to a term of years. Now, let us see what that term of years is. Article XXXIII provides, and I desire to call attention to that—

The foregoing Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive—

They have not got Article XXIX in. It stops before it gets to XXIX. It is XVIII to XXV. These are the fishery articles.

Article XXX—

Skipping Article XXIX, leaping over XXVIII, XXVII, XXVI, and XXIX.

The foregoing Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of this treaty, shall take effect—

When? They did not have effect upon the exchange of ratifications of the treaty. Something else was to be done before they could take effect. Up to the time that these things were done they were mere mutual propositions from one country to the other. Let us see what were the things to be done—shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the Legislature of Prince Edward Island on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other.

You will note that not one of these articles from XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX could ever have the slightest effect as a contract, as a treaty obligation between the United States and Great Britain, until four distinct legislative bodies should give effect to them. Three would not do. It required the English Parliament, it required the Canadian Parliament, it required the Legislature of Prince Edward Island, and it required the Congress of the United States, and any one of these four failing to give its assent to the going into effect of these articles, the articles would have remained forever without the slightest obligation or force whatever.

It seems that the exchange of ratifications of this treaty was in June, 1871. Remember that. The legislation of all these parties took place prior to the 1st day of July, 1873, when these articles were declared by both governments to take effect, so that for more than two years after the treaty was signed and ratified every other article in the treaty except those mentioned in this particular article or otherwise limited were in full force and effect. Note that. There is nothing said there about Article XXIX—not a word—as to putting it into effect.

Now I proceed to read the last clause of the article and to see how and what is to be done in the way of terminating these articles. Article XXXIII contains a power not only to put these articles into operation, but also to destroy their life. Without Article XXXIII and the action required by Article XXXIII those articles could never have had birth, never could have had any effect. Having had birth and having had effect, they never could have been terminated without the provisions of Article XXXIII. Now let us see what the provision is about the termination, and I will read from the place where I stopped before:

Such assent—

That is, of these four legislative bodies—

Such assent having been given, the said articles shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation; and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said period of ten years or at any time afterward.

You hear nothing in this article of Article XXIX, either as to its birth or as to its death; and yet, singular as it may seem, without a single word justifying it, it is insisted that Article XXIX is of perpetual obligation unless in pursuance of Article XXXIII it is terminated. Where do you get your power to terminate it under Article XXXIII? You can not construe treaties upon any idea of just taking the language and making it mean anything that you see proper to make it mean. They are contracts, solemn contracts, between great nations, entered into with deliberation, intended to preserve peace between nations, to regulate rights between nations, to regulate intercourse between nations, and treaties, like other contracts, like other writings, like statutes, are to be construed according to the plain meaning of the language employed. Now, I should like to hear some astute lawyer make the argument by which we can terminate Article XXIX under the provisions of Article XXXIII, except as an incident to the termination of the fishery articles and Article XXX. Article XXIX is not referred to expressly or by implication.

As I have just remarked, you can not amend a treaty by merely attributing to it a meaning which it does not have, but which you wish it to have. You can not interpolate into a treaty a provision which the parties to it did not put in it when they made it. You can not do that expressly, nor have you the power by a dishonest, a hypercritical, an ingenious argumentation to do by implication what you can not do expressly. This argument can not be answered; not because it is a strong argument, but because it is an argument founded on the plain, unambiguous words of the treaty itself. Further argument could make it no more plain than if I were to argue that 2 and 2 were 4, or that 10 divided by 2 resulted in 5. There is not a hint, there is not a squinting at Article XXIX in this Article XXXIII.

Then we must go back to Article XXIX, and see how we are going to get rid of it? Is it perpetual? Everybody says it is not. All agree that there is a way to get rid of it, and all agree—that is, those who say it is not already dead—that it must be done in pursuance of Article XXXIII. Now let us see how we are going to get rid of it in pursuance of Article XXXIII, if it does not fall without being named—and that is my position—with Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX. I say that Article XXXIII does provide for an event which terminates Article XXIX, but it provides for this only in providing for the termination of the fishery articles and Article XXX. Article XXIX itself makes the act which destroys the life of these articles destroy its own.

There is not a word in Article XXXIII about the death or termination of Article XXIX; but Article XXIX itself provides for the term of its own existence. It provides when it shall go into effect; it provides when it shall cease to have effect, and what provision is that, Mr. President?

I want to make this plain, because it is so plain to my mind—from the very moment that I first examined it—that such is the result, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] well knows, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] well knows, and as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] well knows, it appears so plain to me that it can not be made the subject of reasonable dispute or argument.

My proposition is that whilst Article XXXIII provides for the birth and for the death of Articles XVIII to XXV, and Article XXX, it contains no provision for the death of Article XXIX. How, then, are we to get rid of it, because Article XXIX itself says that it shall live as long and no longer than the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII? Now let us see. I read:

For the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, etc.—

There is also a provision in behalf of Canadians in the second clause of it—

It is further agreed that, for the like period—

That is for the same term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII certain other rights exist.

Article XXIX provides for its own life; it measures the years of its own existence. It says for the term prescribed in Article XXXIII Article XXIX shall have effect.

Mr. President, all you have to do in order to find out the life of Article XXIX is to find out if there be a term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII, because Article XXIX itself says for that term this article shall live and no longer. Here it is:

Shall remain in force for the period of ten years—

That is the term. From when?—

from the date at which they may come in operation; and, further, until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same.

When we find out what that is do we not find out the life of Article XXIX. On this hinges the controversy as to the proposition of the President's message that we can enact new legislation without violating our treaty rights. Article XXIX came into this world with a label around its neck stating, "Your existence here, your operation, shall be for a term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII."

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator what he thinks the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII is?

Mr. GEORGE. There are two constructions which might be put upon it. I have considered both. I am very glad the Senator called my attention to it, and I shall answer it now. A very strict and narrow construction of it might say that it was ten years plus two.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. GEORGE. Ten years from the time these articles went into operation plus the two years for which the notice was to run before they were to die. But I do not think that is the proper construction. I think, according to an old law maxim, Id certum est quod certum reddi potest, that when the notice was given after a certain number of years, the term of years was fixed; so that the term of years in Article XXXIII I take to be not only the ten years in which notice could not be given and not only the two years in addition which the notice was to run, but all that period of time which elapsed from the commencement of the operation of these articles by the passage of the necessary acts by the four Legislatures, and the time which should elapse before these articles died under the operation of the notice. That is my idea about it, and you can not make it anything else.

Mr. TELLER. If I do not interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TELLER. If it is objectionable to the Senator, I do not wish to interrupt him.

Mr. GEORGE. I believe I would prefer to go on a little further in my argument so that I can present my idea fully to the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I will not interrupt the Senator if it is objectionable to him.

Mr. GEORGE. I would prefer to have the interruption afterwards, although I have no desire to shirk any discussion about this matter, because I feel absolutely certain that I am right, and absolutely certain that there is no amount of ability possessed by any man God ever created that can disprove the plain proposition made by the treaty itself.

I ask the Senator from Colorado to state when he comes to reply to me, and I hope he will take notice of it, if there is any other term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII except the term of years which marked the life of Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX? If there be no other term of years, then, that must be the term of years which fixes the life of Article XXIX, or else in violation of Article XXIX you fix its life by a term of years not mentioned in Article XXXIII. It shall be alive, says Article XXIX, "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII." That is its own provision. You may call it suicide or carrying within its bosom that deadly weapon which automatically destroys it, but it lives, it lives only, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII. There is no human power which can give it one moment's longer existence except a new treaty between the same contracting parties which shall lengthen its existence. That is what they agreed to then, and there is no earthly power under the Constitution of the United States to give to this treaty, this article, or any other article of any treaty an operation or effect which it does not possess within itself.

Treaties are made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and when they are made they are what they are as written and as they mean at the time they are made, and it is not in the power of a committee of the Senate, it is not in the power of a President of the United States, it is not in the power of a Secretary of State, it is not in the power of all these combined to add one jot or tittle to the legal force and effect of a treaty, or detract from it one jot or tittle of its inherent strength.

If that is not right, let us see what the other view is. Sometimes one of the most effective means of destroying a fallacy is to apply the argument which the mathematicians call the reductio ad absurdum. Article XXIX says it shall have life for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII, as I have so often stated. If it has life and existence independent of Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX, then let us see what will follow? As I have shown already, Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX required the assent of four distinct, independent legislative bodies before they could have life. None of these bodies was bound by this treaty ever to give assent to these articles or to pass the laws necessary to put them into operation.

Suppose the legislature of Prince Edward Island or the Congress of the United States had perpetually refused, either of them or either of the other two, to pass the laws necessary to put these fishery articles and Article XXX into operation. If Article XXIX had an independent life and existence, if it was not bound by the very terms prescribed in itself as to the time when it should begin and when it should end, we would have had this extraordinary result, that Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX, never having received the assent of all the four legislatures, would never have gone into operation, and Article XXIX would have been in operation all the time. If that be so, then how can you square that with the language "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII," for which it shall have existence? Under that view of it, instead of having existence and force and effect for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII it would have had a perpetual existence in direct contravention of the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII. Certainly you can not put a construction upon a treaty which thus turns and twists and reverses its plain meaning and language.

But if that is not correct, how are you going to get rid of it? Certainly it is to die some time; certainly it contemplated only a temporary existence "for a term of years." How are you to get rid of it? Can you give notice? Suppose we do give notice that Article XXIX is terminated. Suppose we give it to-day and in two years from now, say the 1st day of September, 1890, that is to be terminated. Suppose we give it life, then, from the 17th day of June, 1873, when the treaty was ratified and when all the other articles went into force, up to the 1st day of September, 1890, it would have a life then from 1873 to 1885, and from 1885 to 1889, four years more, which would make four years or more longer than the life of the fishery articles and Article XXX as fixed by the notice under Article XXXIII. How can you make out that proposition consistent with the treaty? You can not inject into this treaty something that is not in it. You can not, according to this treaty, give Article XXIX an operation longer or shorter than the term prescribed in Article XXXIII, and then it must fall. The only term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII is the term of years during which Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX shall live. Besides, and this is conclusive, there is no provision in Article XXXIII or elsewhere in the treaty for giving notice of the termination of Article XXIX. If you undertake to give this notice you go outside of the treaty, you interpolate a provision not in it, and you measure the life of Article XXIX, not by a "term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII," as it requires, but you measure it by an act not authorized by that article nor by any other part of the treaty.

There are two other arguments supplementary to this. One is the copy made by the President in his message from the memorandum made by the joint commissioners who negotiated the treaty. That is in these words:

The transit question was discussed, and it was agreed that any settlement that might be made should include a reciprocal arrangement in that respect for the period for which the fishery articles should be in force.

These joint high commissioners, when they started out to make this treaty, started out with a declaration in writing made by them that they were going to do one thing. They, as I have shown, have done that thing, and yet it is insisted that they have failed to do what they declared they would do and have given a life to the transit arrangement different from and longer than the life of the fisheries articles.

There is another argument which was referred to by the President. I am here only repeating his views. The act of March 1, 1873, provides:

That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act—

That was the proclamation authorizing the President to put in force the fisheries articles and Article XXX upon the assent to those articles given by Congress and by the other three Legislatures to which I have called attention.

SEC. 3. That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as the Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty shall remain in force according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States—

And then repeating exactly the provisions of Article XXIX, providing for transit across the United States.

So we have not only the plain meaning of the words of the treaty itself, but we have the declaration of the men who negotiated it, and we have the act of Congress assented to by both Houses and by the President himself declaring the same thing. Can that be answered? If the plain words of the treaty do not constitute its meaning when those plain words are substantiated by the declarations of the men who made it, upon what can we rely? And the plain words of the treaty and this declaration of the men who made it are fortified by an act of Congress itself. If all these can not settle the meaning of the treaty, I confess I know of no means which can remove doubt from a proposition which any ingenious mind may see proper to dispute.

I believe, Mr. President, I have said all I desire to say on this subject.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I shall not follow the course of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in the discussion of the large number of treaties that have been made at different times between the United States and Great Britain, nor shall I discuss the recent treaty that was before the Senate of the United States, but I shall confine what I have to say, which will be very brief, to the situation as presented by the President's message.

The United States of America as a nation is perhaps as well situated in its relation to other countries as any of the great nations. The people of the United States possess greater advantages than any other people in the world. It is easily within the power of this Government to dominate the western hemisphere if it desires to do so; by true statesmanship it always will be, and my judgment is that the Canadian possessions, in the not far distant future, are destined to become a part of the United States.

In dealing with questions involving the relations of our Government with another, whether great or small, the most serious consideration should be given, and only such steps taken as we may be sure we are right in taking. We have no right to play with national or international affairs to please the fancy or inflame the passions of the people. Great questions involving great interests, even the peace of nations, should be approached with a purpose to ascertain and then do the right, having constantly in view the welfare of our own people, to whom we owe unqualified loyalty and whose servants we are.

On the 20th February last the President sent to this Senate a message transmitting a treaty, commonly known as the fisheries treaty. It was before this body much of the time under consideration until the 21st of this month, when it was rejected. That treaty was ably discussed. And now that it has gone, I believe I am justified in saying that the action of the Senate in rejecting it has met with the approval of a majority of the people of the country. The Senate performed its duty in rejecting it.

The President has since sent us a message, which now lies on the table, which I think may be fairly taken as evidence that even he has become satisfied that his treaty with Canada was a mistake. To retrieve what he has lost by his mistake he launches out into a broader sea, and in my judgment he will find himself in deeper water than he has ever been in before, with greater danger threatening to overtake him.

He says the rejection of the treaty "seems to justify a survey of the condition to which the pending question is thus remitted." This declaration is proper. There can be no fault found with it. He then proceeds to discuss the situation between our Government and Canada as it existed before the treaty was made and also since the rejection of the treaty, and says he is "by no means disposed to abandon the interests and the rights of our people in the premises, or to neglect their grievances," and he therefore turns "to the contemplation of a plan of retaliation as a mode, which still remains, of treating the situation."

Mr. President, from the language quoted one would infer that the President had actually debated the question in his own mind whether after his pet treaty had been rejected by the Senate, a part of the treaty-making power, he would do anything more, and if so what, and that he finally patriotically and generously concluded that he would adopt the course marked out by the law. How grateful the American people should feel for the conclusion to which the President came as to the course he would pursue after he saw that his treaty was dead. The treaty related to the fishery troubles, nothing else. Our country has been having no serious trouble with Canada that can not probably be easily settled, about anything else, and yet the President seems to almost turn his back upon the fishery question, and from the contemplation of the wrongs inflicted upon American fishermen, which called for the act of 1887, which is known as the retaliation act, and calls the attention of the country to other grievances, and asks for more power of retaliation than the statute of 1887 gives him, though he has never taken a step to enforce the law in his hands. He wants more power. Why has he not used the power in his hands? He undertook to make a treaty because he said American fishermen were wronged, and by the continued repetition of wrongs upon the rights of American citizens the nation was being disgraced. Why does he stop now to ask for more power and fail to use what he has? Mr. President, I desire to be entirely respectful to the President and the high office he holds; but, sir, I can not resist the feeling that his call upon Congress for more power is not prompted by high motives of patriotism so much as by a desire to break the fall caused by his mistake in bringing to the light of day a treaty that has been shown to be so impotent for the purpose of its creation.

The President recommends that he be authorized to suspend by proclamation the operation of all laws permitting transportation in bond through the United States of shipments coming from or going to Canada. He assures us that we need have no hesitation in giving him this authority or in suspending the operation of those laws on the supposition that their continuation is secured by treaty obligations, and proceeds to argue that Article XXIX of the treaty, which, as he says, incorporated the laws in question, is no longer in force. This discovery appears to be an entirely original one on the part of the President. If he is entirely mistaken in the matter, and Article XXIX remains in full force and effect, as everybody supposed to be the case until this message came in, then of course it would be inconsistent with our treaty obligations to grant to the President the authority which he asks.

If the article has been utterly disregarded, as the Senator from Mississippi has stated, it is within the power of the President alone to disregard the treaty, either in whole or in part, perhaps.

Let us see what the exact language of the treaty itself is on this subject. Article XXIX begins as follows: "It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty," etc.

The same language precisely was used in the fishery articles, and in Article XXVIII, which made the navigation of Lake Michigan free to subjects of Great Britain. Turning next to Article XXXIII, we find that it enumerates the fishery articles, and provides that—

The said articles shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation; and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same.

Neither Article XXVIII nor Article XXIX is mentioned in Article XXXIII, and yet their duration or continuance is stated to be "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII." The question is, therefore, what is that term of years?

The Senator from Mississippi says that if Article XXIX was not abrogated and did not fall when the other articles were abrogated—the articles from XVIII to XXV and Article XXX—then, when does it end? I answer that the article remains in force indefinitely, if you please, until two years' notice, as required by Article XXXIII of the treaty itself; or, if the treaty has been disregarded by the other power, then it is within the power of this Government to abrogate it at once without any formal notice.

The question is, therefore, what is that term of years? There was no particular reason why the duration of the articles in relation to the navigation of Lake Michigan and to shipments through both countries in bond should be limited to the duration of the fishery articles, which in their terms and in the arrangement of the treaty were treated as an independent subject. Being thus treated, there was no question as to the limit of their duration. That was plainly stated by Article XXXIII to be for ten years and until two years after the required notice of their termination was given.

Article XXIX begins by saying "It is agreed that for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII." What was the term of years? It was the ten years certain, and then two years after notice had been given. As to the articles from XVIII to XXIX and Article XXX (skipping those between), the ten years had expired, two years' notice had been given, and those two years had expired, and then those articles mentioned had expired with the term; but as to Article XXIX the ten years have expired, but there has been no notice given by this Government that it desired that this article should expire, and therefore the article is in force, and is so regarded not only by this Government but by the Government of Great Britain as well; and I say that the only way you can get rid of it is by declaring that the other side has disregarded it, and then assuming the responsibility of disregarding it as well, or if that does not exist, giving the two years' notice, and then the treaty will fall at the expiration of the term.

The President expresses the opinion that "the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII" which was to be the duration of Article XXIX means the period during which the fishery articles remained in force. I do not think this view is justified by an examination of the language used in the several articles referred to. Article XXIX, like Article XXVIII, by its terms plainly remains in force "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII." That term of years was plainly, first, the period of ten years from the date when the treaty went into operation, and, secondly, a farther indefinite period extending until the expiration of two years after either party had given notice of its wish to terminate any article of the treaty. It can not be contended that "the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII" during which Article XXXIX was to remain in force meant only the period of ten years which is mentioned. On the contrary, it evidently meant both that period of ten years and whatever further period of time might elapse until a notice of termination was given and took effect.

This, then, must be the period during which Article XXIX remains in force, and, as no notice of a wish to terminate it has been given by either power, it must still be in force to-day and can not be abrogated except after two years' notice or upon the ground that the other country has so utterly disregarded it as to justify the American nation in disregarding it also.

That I am not alone in thus dissenting from the opinion expressed by the President will appear from the opinions expressed by others, to which I shall now call attention.

While the present interstate-commerce act was under consideration the committee of conference which draughted it gave attention to the difficulty encountered in applying its provisions to the Canadian railroads. The question of how far we were hampered in our proposed legislation by our treaty obligations with Canada was raised, and in our search for information inquiry was naturally made of the Department of State. This inquiry was made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], and the reply of Mr. Bayard, which the Senator placed on the files of the Interstate Commerce Committee, was as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 7, 1887.

SIR: I had the honor to receive late yesterday afternoon your telegram asking to be informed "when was the treaty of Washington between the United States and the Dominion of Canada abrogated? When did its provisions cease to operate?"

The information you desire is found in the accompanying document, containing the correspondence which took place between this Department and the British minister in 1885, and the President's proclamation in regard to the termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington.

This document is reprinted in full in the recently printed Executive Document in relation to the rights of American fishermen in British North American waters (Executive Document No. 19, House of Representatives, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pages 199-210), a copy of which is also inclosed herewith.

The treaty of Washington between the United States and Great Britain did not relate solely to the Canadian fisheries. Only the fishery articles thereof were abrogated, as enumerated in the President's proclamation of January 31, 1885. The remaining articles, comprising those which relate to commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American possessions, are still in force.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN,
U. S. Senate.

In this letter Mr. Bayard distinctly states that the articles of the treaty "which relate to commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American possessions are still in force." Mr. Bayard is the President's adviser in such matters. It is to him that the President would naturally turn for information in respect to the matters discussed in his message, but this letter, in which it is stated, without any qualification whatever, that Article XXIX remains in force, confirms my statement that the President's discovery of the termination of Article XXIX must be original with himself or have come from outside of his own Administration. The opinions expressed by the President in respect to Article XXIX certainly could not have been communicated to him by his Secretary of State, unless the latter has recently changed his mind on a subject about which he did not entertain the least doubt whatever last year.

In the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon the treaty recently rejected, submitted May 7 last, it is distinctly stated, although in an incidental way, that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 is still in force. But there can be no mistaking the language used in respect to this article in the accompanying report of the minority of the committee. That minority report bears the signatures of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE]. These gentlemen represented the Administration in attempting to defend its one-sided and un-American fisheries treaty, and will be expected to uphold the views of the President as to the termination of Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871. Let us see what they say.

Referring to the abrogation of the fisheries articles the minority report says:

Article XXIX was not terminated, but it never had the least reference to the fisheries treaty of 1818, to enlarge its scope, change its meaning, or in any way to affect any right to which that treaty related. Yet, if that is not the true meaning of the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, this present treaty in no way affects that article, and it stands for all that it was ever worth in favor of our fishermen.

Mr. President, there is not the slightest difficulty in our distinguished friends on the other side of the Chamber changing as often as the President of the United States himself sees proper to change, and therefore it is that when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who signed the minority report, a part of which I shall quote in a moment, was asked the other day if he believed that Article XXIX was still in force, he said it is not, and of course the Senators on that side will all indorse the position the Administration has so recently taken.

Mr. DOLPH. That is the minority report?

Mr. CULLOM. That is the minority report of the committee making the report on the fisheries treaty and the language as incorporated in it by the Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

Evidently the views now expressed by the President in respect to Article XXIX were not communicated to him by the Democratic members of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, for in May last those Senators believed and stated that Article XXIX was still in force.

Both Governments have understood and have acted upon the supposition that this Article XXIX remains in force at the present time, and additional evidence of the correctness of this view could be presented if necessary; but in order to avoid any charge of "offensive partisanship" in taking issue with the President on the subject, and in venturing to question his infallibility upon questions of international law, I am content to rest the case, so far as the question of this article being in force is concerned, by placing against the declarations of the President on the subject those of his own Secretary of State and of the Senators representing his party upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, leaving them to reconcile the opposing views they have expressed as best they can.

The laws which the President now asks authority to suspend the operation of were passed prior to the treaty of 1871 and are still in force. They are found in the Revised Statutes, and are as follows:

SEC. 3095. All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland in Maine, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel in Texas, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed, in transit, through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 3006. Imported merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces or Republic of Mexico, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein, over the territory of such provinces or Republic, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from such provinces or Republic, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

As the existence of these statutes and the President's sudden anxiety to suspend their operation seem to be the only public reason for his message, they are worthy of some consideration.

In the first place, it must be clear upon examination of these statutes that a very large part of the shipments in bond through our territory to and from Canada, which the President now wants power to stop, are not authorized or carried on under these statutes. Section 3005 authorizes importations arriving at New York, Boston, and Portland, Me., and destined for Canada, to be carried through our territory free of duty, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but it does not authorize shipments to be made from Canada through our territory for exportation, nor does it authorize importations to be made at any ports except the three named, unless such other ports are specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is plain, therefore, that section 3005 does not authorize all the shipments in bond that are now made, and if the President believes, as he says in his message, that Article XXIX of the treaty and section 3 of the act of 1873 are no longer in force, it might be in order to inquire by what authority he now permits any shipments to be made in bond from Canada.

Mr. President, when I conclude my remarks I think I shall introduce a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate whether he is to-day permitting any shipments from Canada through the United States to our ports for export, or what other shipments he is allowing that are not authorized by section 3005 of the Revised Statutes. I know of no law except section 3005 under which he can authorize these importations to the United States and through our country to the provinces of Canada, and I know of no law, if the law of 1873 has been repealed, that authorizes him to permit shipments from Canada through the United States to our ports for exportation.

In the second place it will be observed that section 3005 is simply permissive in its terms, and that its operation is placed entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It provides that the privileges specified may be granted under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe.

We have been discussing the fisheries treaty here for a number of months. It has been before us since some time in the early spring. Recitations of outrages in connection with our fisheries have been given to us by the President of the United States. Yet in all this period of time since the act of 1887 was passed giving the President the power of retaliation as to outrages on account of the fisheries we have had no information from him that there has been any wrong done on the part of the people of Canada upon the people of the United States in connection with our commercial relations.

As I say, the act provides that the privileges specified may be granted under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe. It is entirely within the discretion of the Secretary to grant or continue these privileges. Even if it should be claimed that in this statute "may" means "shall," the whole matter is still practically within the discretion of the Secretary, because the transportation must be carried on under such regulations as he prescribes; and under this power, which no one can question, the Secretary can, if he pleases, make regulations which would practically be prohibitory. In other words, if he pleases, the Secretary can make it so inconvenient to comply with his regulations that no one would do so.

Therefore, taking the President's view of the situation, we find that he sent this message to Congress because he wants authority to suspend the operation of section 3005, and we find that the operation of that section rests entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. If the President is right in his contention that Article XXIX of the treaty and section 3 of the act of 1873 are no longer in force—that is what he says in his message—the authority which he asks Congress to give him, and all the authority he needs, is the authority to make his own Secretary of the Treasury do his bidding.

In any view of the situation that can be taken, whether we agree with the President or disagree with him, no action by Congress is necessary in order to suspend the operation of the statutes of 1866. The simple fact of the matter is that the President asks for authority which ought not to be exercised, and could not be honorably, if Article XXIX of the treaty remains in force, or which he does not need at all if it is not. That is the sum and substance of the whole matter.

One word about the discrimination against American vessels using the Canadian canals to which the President calls attention. This discrimination against our citizens must be stopped, and there ought to be no difficulty whatever in stopping it if this Administration could be induced to move in the matter. The right to the use of those canals on equal terms with the Canadians themselves is expressly secured to us by treaty stipulations, and if these are violated, as the President says they have been, the natural, common-sense course would be to call the attention of the British Government to the matter in the ordinary way. In all probability this would result in the immediate discontinuance of the discrimination. If it did not, it would be time enough to ask for legislation on the subject, but we have no evidence that the course always pursued under such circumstances has been resorted to in this instance.

When we have applied this message to the situation as it exists and see how little excuse there is for it, the fact that it was inspired by political necessity becomes more and more apparent. In fact, this message may be regarded as Mr. Cleveland's long-delayed letter of acceptance of the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, because it betrays so clearly his anxiety for another term of office and his fear that he will not be elected. His complete change of front on the fisheries question shows that Mr. Cleveland and his party are in desperate straits politically, that they see defeat staring them in the face, and that they are seeking to divert attention from the one issue upon which they deliberately staked all their chances of success at the approaching election.

In my judgment this whole movement is merely a political movement, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the proof of what I say upon that question. I find in the newspapers of the country a dispatch on the day of the delivery of this message to Congress, dated Columbus, Ohio, August 24, 1888, and it says:

> Have prominent Irishmen send congratulatory telegrams to President Cleveland on his message on the fishery treaty, and get up demonstration, if possible.
> J. R. TOWNSEND,
> Chairman Ohio State Central Committee.

I hear also that this man Townsend has been and perhaps is now a partner of the distinguished gentleman, Mr. Brice, who was here, I believe, in the city in close conference with the President at the time the message was issued, and who had undoubtedly informed his law partner, who was chairman of the State Democratic committee of Ohio, of what was going to happen, and notified him to do what Mr. Townsend proceeded to do, to get up demonstrations and have prominent Irishmen send telegrams to the President of the United States and congratulate him upon the delivery of his message.

I find here a few dispatches that were the result of that order. One of them is dated New York, August 24, and reads:

> I congratulate you on behalf of the entire business community. Your message is a masterpiece of dignity and statesmanship.
> HERMAN OELRICHS.

I do not know how much of an Irishman he is, but the name does not quite sound like one. I believe that he is one of the captains that is running the Democratic national committee in New York along with Mr. Brice.

I find another from my own State, as follows:

> CHICAGO, August 24.
> Your message is received with universal approval by the people. I congratulate you.
> ERSKINE W. PHELPS.

He is another member of the national Democratic committee, and he is undertaking to re-elect the present President of the United States. I do not think that Mr. Phelps is very much of an Irishman. They were the only class that were appealed to by the chairman; but the national Democratic committee have been unable to get up demonstrations so far.

So I could go and give a list of chairmen of Democratic clubs and of Democratic county committees, all of them sending congratulatory dispatches to the President on account of that tremendous message which he sent here, that was to startle the country and attract, if you please, the attention of the people of this country from the great issue that they are determined to adhere to to the end in this campaign, whether the people of this country shall have any protection to American industries and American labor, or whether we shall inaugurate a system of free trade in this country that shall break down the industries of the country and reduce the wages of our American citizens to a pauper basis.

I see no evidence here in these dispatches, as in the evidences that come to us from the country anywhere, that the message has excited any admiration on the part of the Irish people, who were expected to rally to its support and get up demonstrations on account of the message. They knew too well that the purpose of that message, as I said, was to mend the hold of the Administration. It knew that it had lost them upon the great issue, and not only that, but because of its leaning to the British Government from the very beginning of this Administration up to the time when the message was sent here and until the Irish people of the country had determined that they would have no more of it.

The necessities of the political situation demanded that the President should, in the words of the manager of his campaign, "do something to help himself." What could he do and what did he do? In the search for some means of diversion he turned to the contemplation of our relations with Canada, knowing that the country strongly disapproved the policy and course of his administration in respect to the treatment of our fishermen by the Canadian authorities. The rejection of his un-American treaty having met the approval of the people, it behooved him to make amends for his serious blunder in negotiating and insisting upon the ratification of a treaty which involved a cowardly surrender of American rights when an entirely different course of action had been decided upon by Congress and the path of his duty had been plainly marked out for him by law.

In the hour of their tribulation and distress what did the President and his advisers do? What has the Democratic party always done when its own plans and policies have been repudiated by the people, as they usually have been? The question answers itself. They adopt the policy of the Republican party and claim it as their own.

Since the President's message upon the tariff question last December, and since the passage of the Mills bill, or more especially since its introduction, the Democratic party have sought every opportunity that it had the power and of which it could avail itself to undertake to show that the President's message did not mean free trade, and that the Mills bill did not mean free trade. If we shall wait a little longer they will be insisting that they are a better protection party than the Republican party itself.

The President's message shows that the emphatic protests which have repeatedly been made upon this side of the Chamber against the long-continued neglect by this Administration of the grievances of our fishermen have not been made in vain. After at least two years of indifference to their interests the President is at last ready to act, or rather, to state the situation more exactly, to talk about doing something. If he was ready to act, or wanted to act, he would at once adopt the policy of retaliation marked out for him by the act of March 3, 1887; but he is only seeking to do what the managers of his campaign have for some time insisted must be done if he desired to be re-elected, and that is "to do something to help himself," and so he only talks about retaliation against Canada instead of actually retaliating, as he could any day or any hour.

But even this partial and eleventh-hour conversion of one so set in his ways as Mr. Cleveland is exceedingly encouraging, and I think we upon this side may with good reason congratulate ourselves upon the apparent adoption by the present Executive, reluctant and tardy though it has been, of the accepted Republican policy of protection to the rights and interests of American citizens in all their dealings with foreign nations.

After ignoring the plain requirements of the retaliation act for a year and a half without making the slightest effort towards retaliation, the President now comes to the front as the champion of the policy of retaliation. With the customary zeal of a new convert for a policy he has steadily opposed, Mr. Cleveland now professes a desire to enter upon a policy of retaliation that shall be at once "thorough and vigorous." The reason he does not retaliate is because he is so strongly in favor of retaliation and so anxious to retaliate.

The retaliation act of 1887 marked out clearly and plainly the course of action to be pursued by the President when he found retaliation to be necessary, and when he became as anxious to retaliate as Mr. Cleveland now professes to be. The investigation and consideration of the fisheries trouble by the last Congress resulted in the passage of that act, and the course of action there laid down was deliberately decided upon by Congress as the proper one to be pursued under the circumstances. That act was signed by the present Executive, notwithstanding his immoderate indulgence in the exercise of the veto power, and must be presumed to have then met his approval. It was believed then and is believed now that the exercise of the great powers conferred upon the President by that act would speedily bring to an end the outrages perpetrated upon our fishermen by the Canadian authorities. That act provided that whenever the President "shall be satisfied" that American fishing vessels or American fishermen have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights in Canadian waters or ports secured to them by treaty or law, "it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion," to deny to Canadian vessels any entrance into our ports, "and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States."

While the words "in his discretion" are used in the act, they apply rather to the particular modes of retaliation prescribed than to the question of enforcing the act, and it will be observed that the act contains the mandatory provision that "it shall be the duty of the President" to deny to the Canadians the privileges specified whenever he shall be satisfied that such a state of facts exists as he says in his message has existed. It is now about a year and a half since the law went into force, the condition of affairs which made it the duty of the President to act has existed during that time, his statement of the situation shows that he is satisfied of the fact, and yet none of the steps which the law required him to take have been taken.

After ignoring the existence and requirements of this law for a year and a half he now comes to Congress at this late day and asks for more power, because he is so anxious to enter upon a policy of retaliation. No reason is given for his failure to exercise the great powers already conferred upon him, but the pretense is made that a further grant of power is necessary. It is the same sort of pretense that was resorted to by this Administration in regard to the payment of the public debt in order to pile up a surplus as an argument for free trade. The President doubted the authority to buy bonds, although nobody else did, and delayed action on the pretense that further legislation was necessary. In a matter of such importance Congress was willing to gratify his whim, and sent him the desired legislation, but it contained restrictions he did not like, and rather than accept them he abandoned his pretense of want of power and concluded the law gave all the power necessary, as everybody knew.

This Administration has been from first to last one of sham and pretense. It has made a pretense of economy, but has been the most extravagant one we have ever had for very many years. It has made a pretense of favoring civil-service reform, while there never has been one that so utterly disregarded it, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the chairman of the select committee on that subject, has shown by his statements here and by discussions which have taken place. I have in my hand a newspaper, which I shall not take up the time of the Senate to read, but which gives an account of civil-service reform in the great city of Chicago, in my own State, in connection with the post-office there, where the law partner of the postmaster put a card upon his door and sent cards to the various employés, telling them to come over and see him, and the account says that the ante-room of that distinguished lawyer, the partner of the postmaster at Chicago, was full of people knocking at the door to get in to make the contributions, so that they might not lose their places.

This Administration made a pretense of an anxiety to reduce the surplus, but allowed it to accumulate for nearly a year before a dollar was paid out in the payment of debt which then was due. In its anxiety to reduce the terrible surplus of which we hear so much the Administration has succeeded in securing the passage elsewhere of a tariff bill that would increase the revenues instead of decrease them, and has contrived to conduct the purchase of bonds in such a blundering way as to unnecessarily enhance their price and to needlessly pay out large sums to speculators as premiums.

One thing, however, this Administration has done, and it is entitled to whatever credit it can claim for such methods of financiering. It has transferred many millions of dollars from the Treasury to the custody of favored national banks. These banks undoubtedly find it profitable to hold and use these millions of dollars of the people's money. The interest or profit they receive on its use is not paid to the United States, but it will be surprising if a liberal slice of this "swag" does not find its way into the coffers of the Democratic national committee. That committee, it seems, does not hesitate to make those employed in the civil service "stand and deliver."

And the President's pretense that he needs further power in order to undertake a policy of retaliation against Canada is on a par with those that have characterized his whole administration. He has not used the great powers already granted him, but pretends that he wants more.

I should like to see the President exercise the power that has now been given him more than a year and a half to protect our American citizens in connection with the fishery trade. If he uses that power discreetly and shows a disposition to protect American citizens, unless we can correct other evils by law I am for giving him other powers in order to correct whatever other evils may exist.

Mr. President, the questions involved in our commercial relations with Canada are important and can not be dealt with carelesssly without danger of doing great injury to our people. Many millions of people in the West and Northwest, with their vast crops of grain and other products about ready for the markets of the world, must be remembered in the consideration of our duty here. I am for doing anything and everything that we can do consistent with honor and the interest of our people if on investigation it shall be found that any legislation is necessary.

But I am not willing to concede to the President because he sends a message here talking about grievances that, if they exist at all, have been going on for years, when we have not the scratch of a pen from that Administration showing us what the evils are that he has talked about in his message. I want the President or his Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate why he has been allowing goods in bond to go from Canada to Boston or to New York or to Portland for the purpose of exportation and to tell us under what law that has been going on. I am not able to find any, and if it has been going on it has been going on without any authority of law whatever.

I believe in the warning words of Washington in his farewell address to the American people, when he said:

> Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.

I agree with that, and as I say I agree to-day to any legislation that may be necessary to protect the rights of the American people. So do I agree that if it can be shown that the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 has been utterly disregarded by the British Government, by the Canadians, I agree that we shall disregard it, also, without waiting the two years necessary in order to abrogate it by formal notice.

But so far as that article is concerned, I can not believe that there is any question but that the twenty-ninth article is in force, so far as the terms of the treaty are concerned, or any law that has been passed under it is concerned, and that the term means not only the ten years as specified in the article itself, but also the two years after this Government or the other shall see proper to give notice of its abrogation.

Mr. President, with these remarks I shall not detain the Senate further, but I shall ask leave to insert a synopsis, with a reason or two in connection therewith, of section 3005, section 3006, the third section of the act of March 3, 1873, and also the joint resolution of 1883, which applies to the subject as well, and also Articles XXVI, XXVII, XXVIII, and XXIX of the treaty of 1871.

SECTION 3005.

Section 3005 of the Revised Statutes authorizes the transportation through the territory of the United States without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, of merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, in Maine, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury and destined for places in Canada.

This does not authorize the transportation through the United States, without the payment of duties, of merchandise shipped from Canada to our ports for exportation, nor does it authorize the transportation through our territory to Canada of merchandise imported on the Pacific coast, unless such port on the Pacific coast is specially designated for such purposes by the Secretary of the Treasury.

This section covers only one kind of transportation across our territory, and that is of articles coming from abroad to our ports on the Atlantic coast and going to Canada.

SECTION 3006.

Section 3006 is for the benefit of American rather than Canadian shippers. It provides for the transportion of imported merchandise in bond, and products or manufactures of the United States, from one port in the United States to another, through Canadian territory.

THE ACT OF 1873.

The act of March 1, 1873, was passed to carry into effect the treaty of 1871. The third section of this act provided that so long as the fisheries articles of the treaty remained in force goods arriving at our ports from foreign countries might be conveyed through our territory into the British possessions without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury might prescribe.

So far this section is similar to section 3005, but in addition it contained a provision authorizing the shipment of goods, wares, and merchandise, under similar circumstances, from Canada through the territory of the United States for export.

This section, by its terms, provided that the shipments which it authorized might be made from the day on which the treaty of 1871 took effect and so long as the fisheries articles of said treaty remained in force. This section would therefore appear to have expired by limitation, unless it has been saved or extended by the joint resolution of March 3, 1883.

JOINT RESOLUTION OF 1883.

The joint resolution of March 3, 1883, was passed to terminate the fisheries articles of the treaty of 1871.

By the third section of this resolution the provisions of the act of 1873, which was passed to convey the treaty into effect, were repealed so far as they related to the fisheries articles of the treaty. As section 3 of the act of 1873 did not relate to the fisheries articles, that section was not repealed by the joint resolution of 1883, and, if it has not expired by limitation, is not affected by that resolution.

THE TREATY.

Article XXVI of the treaty of 1871 relates to the navigation of the St. Lawrence River.

Article XXVII relates to the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence, and other canals by Americans, and the use of our canals by Canadians.

Article XXVIII makes the navigation of Lake Michigan free to the British subjects.

Article XXIX relates to the shipment through our territory of merchandise destined to or coming from Canada, and its terms are substantially the same as those of section 3 of the act of 1873.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question——

Mr. CULLOM. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States in his message of August 23, 1888, concerning our relations with Canada advises Congress that Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington, which provided for the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond over the territory of the United States to or from Canada is no longer in force; and

Whereas in the same message the President also advises Congress that section 3 of the act of March 1, 1873, passed to carry into effect the provisions of said Article XXIX is no longer in force; and

Whereas section 3005 of the Revised Statutes only authorizes the transit through the territory of the United States of merchandise destined for Canada and arriving from abroad at New York, Boston, and Portland in Maine (or at such other ports as may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury): Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the transit in bond over or across the territory of the United States, without the payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise coming from Canada has been permitted since July 1, 1885, when Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington, and section 3 of the act of March 1, 1873, are said to have ceased to be in force; and, if so, to what extent and by what authority of law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire the adoption of the resolution. It is a mere resolution of inquiry.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the resolution will go over and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation, in Kansas.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Hugh L. Brinkley and Annie O. Snowden, there having been no adverse report thereon.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is objection, the formal reading will be dispensed with and the bill will be read for amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations may be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be followed.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert, as section 1:

That the appropriations hereinafter provided for shall be available until expended, and shall be expended under the direct supervision of a board to consist of the commanding general of the Army, an officer of engineers, an officer of ordnance, and an officer of artillery, to be selected by the Secretary of War, to be called and known as the board of ordnance and fortification; and said board shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War and subject to his supervision and control in all respects, and shall have power to provide suitable regulations for the inspection of guns and materials at all stages of manufacture to the extent necessary to protect fully the interests of the United States, and generally to provide such regulations concerning matters within said board's operations as shall be necessary to carry out to the best advantage all duties committed to its charge.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the attention of the Senator from Kansas in charge of the bill for a moment. I desire to move an amendment for his consideration and the consideration of the Senate. In line 6 of the new section I propose to strike out the words "an officer" and to insert "two officers;" so as to read: "two officers of ordnance;" making the board consist of an officer of engineers, two officers of ordnance, and an officer of artillery.

I move the amendment as the result of a long conversation with General Schofield, now the commanding general of the Army, who thinks, as this work is chiefly ordnance work, a single ordnance officer will be overburdened with his share of the work. This is the general opinion, in which I very earnestly and heartily coincide. The work of this board of ordnance and fortification, chiefly advisory, will to a large extent fall upon the ordnance officer, especially the preparation of papers and the working over of the matter. Two ordnance officers will be valuable. The work will be better done in all probability.

Another consideration arises. This is ordnance work largely, and if there be but one ordnance officer and an officer of engineers and an officer of artillery, it may frequently happen that, in the ordnance field especially, the ordnance officer will be outvoted by two men from other corps of the Army. These three will be the active and working men of the board. The commanding general of the Army will only come in occasionally or to decide disputes among them. If the engineer and the artillery officer should overrule the ordnance officer, it would rest upon the commanding general of the Army to correct it, or to make a tie, if you choose. He is only a member of the board; he is not commanding officer of the board, and could not overrule the two; so that the board would go on and frequently perhaps end in a tie, for the Secretary of War to decide. He is not a technical man; he knows nothing of the details of the manufacture of ordnance and matters of artillery, of course. If you have two ordnance officers and an artillery officer and an engineer officer on the board, and it shall be tied—and I am guarding against the manifestation of jealousies in the staff corps—General Schofield is quite capable and would easily have the authority then to make the board harmonize.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, after the word "engineers," it is proposed to strike out the words "an officer" and insert "two officers;" so as to read:

Two officers of ordnance.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BECK. The board is to consist of whom, then?

Mr. HAWLEY. Let the Secretary begin reading in line 5.

The SECRETARY. So as to make the clause read:

A board to consist of the commanding general of the Army, an officer of engineers, two officers of ordnance, and an officer of artillery, to be selected by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HALE. That makes the board composed of five.

Mr. HAWLEY. It makes the working board four.

Mr. BECK. It makes five with the commanding general of the Army?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BECK. That can not hurt much.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he does not think it would improve the bill to put a civilian on the board?

Mr. HAWLEY. If I were going to draught a bill—and it ought to be done by an independent bill really—for the establishment of an advisory board, I should perhaps put in a civilian or two. Two eminent civilians were on that very eminent board of fortifications two years ago, the most efficient board that I have known for a long time. But I do not think it necessary in this board. This is a mere professional advisory board of the Secretary of War, and I do not believe it is necessary to put a civilian on it. If it were a temporary board to make a great examination, a board like the fortifications board, I should want to call in two outsiders.

Mr. PLUMB. There is some force in what the Senator from Connecticut has said, and in view of what he reports is the deliberate judgment of General Schofield, although it has not been presented to the committee, I shall have no objection to the adoption of the amendment which he proposes.

There is something always to be said, of course, in favor of a small board. In this case there is a good deal to be said in favor of having a board which will embrace members of all the bureaus of the War Department having to deal with the question of offensive and defensive military operations. It was, therefore, thought proper to bring in the Engineer and Artillery Corps as well as the Ordnance Corps, although, as the Senator from Connecticut very properly says, the Ordnance people work out the detail and largely the plan, and must of necessity do so in the construction of guns, and will continue to do so, of course, under the operations of this section.

I think I shall not interpose any objection to the adoption of the amendment. We shall come to the consideration of this question after a time with more experience on account of the trial we shall make of this plan, and if it does not work well we can then change it.

The suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] about having a civilian on the board had consideration at the hands of the committee, and it originally was my own belief that that would be not only proper but very desirable. However, in the first place, it enlarges the board; it makes it to some extent unwieldy. There might be a considerable period of time before the board would get into that harmonious relation which would tend to efficiency of operations. There would be some jealousy, of course, existing as to who should be selected, and as to the weight to be given to the suggestions of the various component parts, divided as they would be into the two classes of military men and civilians.

I think, on the whole, in starting this matter as we propose to do by the bill, the most important thing which we do in it is really to make sure that we have the combined co-operation of all the branches of the Army, not only in determining upon the plans, but in working them out, and that I think is satisfactorily accomplished in the constitution of the board as proposed. If it shall seem after we get into this thing more largely, as we shall do, and after we try the plans which are proposed, that they are not what they ought to be, that they are not being worked out properly by reason of incompetency or jealousy, or anything else, we can reconstruct the board in such a way as to make it answer to what may then seem to be the needs of the service.

Mr. TELLER. The trouble with the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas is that we are to go on with a system here and after we have gone on some time he suggests that if we find it is a failure then we can bring into the board some other talent. I do not wish myself to say anything that will be regarded as derogatory to the character of the officers of the Army with reference to these things, but I know it is a fact, which everybody will admit who has looked into these questions at all, that if we were selecting for great enterprises as a general rule we should avoid the engineers or any other department of the Army of the United States. The Engineer Corps in the United States Army has never distinguished itself above the civilian engineers of the country, as everybody knows.

The questions to be presented to the board will be very largely questions of engineering, and it seems to me (though I have not any idea that the Senate will depart from the report of the committee; I want to express my view of the subject, however), that it would have been wise to have given the President an opportunity to select some eminent civil engineer to be put in here. Especially is that true if the system is to remain as it is contemplated, which I understand is to have outside parties come in and offer to the Government guns. I think that it would have been no more than fair to the outside people who are expected to offer to make guns that there should have been some eminent civilian engineer selected by the President. I do not suggest, of course, that the legislative department should designate who should go in, but there are a great number of engineers in this country from whom the President could select. As this is to be a matter of long standing it would be practically, if a good selection were made, a life duty for some great engineer in this country, and I am very confident that the results attained would be very much better than will be attained under the present plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to further amend the amendment by adding at the end of the section, after the word "charged," in line 17, the following proviso:

Provided, That subject to the foregoing provisions the expenditure shall be made by the several bureaus of the War Department having jurisdiction of the same under existing law.

That simply provides that the agencies which now exist in the Department for the transaction of the various classes of business, if I may so term it, shall be continued the same as now, only under the direction and supervision of the board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the Senator from Kansas whether in line 9 the words "and control" should not be inserted after the word "direction?"

Mr. PLUMB. Those words should be in; and the Senator will see that the word "control" occurs in line 11—"supervision and control." That settles it.

Mr. HALE. That is correct. I did not see that the words occurred in line 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was to change "Sec. 1" to "Sec. 2."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 7 of section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sums of money herein provided for be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

For the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, $100,000. For the construction of sea-walls, and for earth embankments, $117,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make an inquiry just there of the Senator in charge of the bill as to the fortifications. There is nothing here that provides a dime for the improvement or renewal of fortifications as well as preservation and repair. These fortifications cost us some twenty or thirty million dollars, and $200,000 is a comparatively small sum. I wish to inquire whether the estimates of the War Department are not larger than the amount here named?

Mr. PLUMB. No; the sum given is precisely the estimate of the War Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. For their preservation?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir; that paragraph, commencing in line 4 and ending in line 7, is not only the amount but in the precise language of the estimate of the War Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. It has been the custom for many years to recommend large sums for continuing the building or building new ones, but they have given that up I presume.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 2, line 15, before the words "hundred thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so as to read:

For torpedoes for harbor defense; the purchase of submarine mines and necessary appliances to operate them; for needful casemates, cable-galleries, and appliances to render it possible to operate submarine mines; for continuing torpedo experiments; for practical instruction of engineer troops in detail of the service, and for movable submarine torpedoes propelled and controlled at will by power transmitted from shore stations, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to amend, in line 13, of section 2, by inserting after the word "for" the words "the purchase of." That is the intent of the section, but I am somewhat afraid that the purpose is not expressed with sufficient clearness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, line 13, after the word "for," it is proposed to insert "the purchase of;" so as to read:

And for the purchase of movable submarine torpedoes propelled and controlled at will by power transmitted from shore stations, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section [2] 3, line 6, after the words "service guns," to strike out "for machine guns;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. For the manufacture or purchase and test of cannon and carriages, including two 10-inch carriages maneuvered by power, one of which shall be a disappearing carriage, and also including those for the field and siege services; for the alteration of carriages on hand to adapt them to improved service guns; for projectiles, etc.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can not permit that to go without a protest, though the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] in private conversation has told me something about the amendment.

The Government buys every year more or less of machine guns to supply to the State militia. The well-organized militia of many States, among them Massachusetts and Connecticut and New York and New Jersey and Pennsylvania, have Gatling guns attached to their regiments. In short, there is a little trade every year in that particular weapon. The Government buys the guns and the demand is made for them by the States under the law giving $600,000 a year for supplies to the militia. I should hope the committee would permit those words to remain in the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Really, this provision is covered, though not by name, in a subsequent provision of the bill; but still, if the Senator from Connecticut feels any special interest in having it retained at the present time, I shall not make any contention about it. The discretionary power finally lodged with the board in another part of the bill covers this, but it is not specially mentioned.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope the Senator from Kansas will state that it was the purpose of the committee to exclude all the different classes of guns by name, leaving the selection to the discretion of the board.

Mr. HAWLEY. The committee is quite right in not naming any description of guns. I did not mean to criticise its action in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the words "for machine guns."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section (2) 3, line 14, after the word "employed," to strike out "and to test and, if found satisfactory, to purchase two breech-loading field guns of three and two tenths inch bore, of aluminum bronze, four," and insert "five;" so as to read:

For the manufacture or purchase and test of cannon and carriages, including two ten-inch carriages maneuvered by power, one of which shall be a disappearing carriage, and also including those for the field and siege services; for the alteration of carriages on hand to adapt them to improved service guns; for projectiles, powders, fuzes, and implements, their trial and proof; for experiments in the means of protecting torpedo lines; for compensation of draughtsmen while employed in the Army Ordnance Bureau on ordnance construction, and for the necessary expenses of ordnance officers while temporarily employed at the proving-ground and absent from their proper stations, at the rate of $2.50 per diem while so employed, $500,000, and not more than $10,000 of said sum shall be expended for providing increased facilities for the manufacture of projectiles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [2] 3, line 19, after the word "projectiles," to insert:

For examining, testing, and experimenting with pneumatic or other dynamite guns, gun-carriages, aerial torpedoes, dynamite shells and ammunition, and batteries for coast defense, whether sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise, brought to the notice of the Secretary of War, $100,000, or so much thereof as he may deem proper.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Kansas will pardon me if I make a verbal criticism there. The provision is:

For examining, testing, and experimenting with pneumatic or other dynamite guns, gun-carriages, aerial torpedoes, dynamite shells and ammunition, and batteries for coast defense, whether sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise.

That means really gun-carriages, "sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise." I should myself strike out the words "whether sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise," because the word "sunken" has no reference to the character of carriage. I take it the committee is endeavoring to provide for the purchase of the disappearing carriages that drop with the gun behind the parapet. They are all disappearing, some of them counterpoise and some of them make the gun balance a certain part of the carriage and get the gun out of sight.

I should strike out the words "whether sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise" and insert, after the word "gun-carriages," the words "disappearing and other."

Mr. PLUMB. That language, I think, is embraced in the estimates now, though I am not quite certain about that, but it is found on page 21 of the Army bill, and the phraseology of it, although not criticised as the Senator from Connecticut now criticises it, was very considerably gone over; and therefore the committee in providing for the same class of expenditures here transferred the language bodily. I think very likely the criticism may be right.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator will allow that to stand over, I will consult some technical authority about it; but there is no such thing as a battery "sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise" in the way it is stated here.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that refers to the word "carriages."

Mr. HAWLEY. It does; but the word "carriages" is two or three lines back. However, let that pass. I will see if that can be put in better shape.

Mr. HALE. Do not those words refer to all the enumerations preceding, and do not the subsequent words, "brought to the notice of the Secretary," refer to all those? So it strikes me.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think they do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from Connecticut offers any amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not move any amendment now.

Mr. PLUMB. There is an amendment which I think ought to be made there. That section, as I said, is exactly as it appears in the Army bill, and was, of course, inserted before without any reference to the expenditures being made by a board. I think that perhaps as it is it may be out of harmony with the first section of the bill, and that the words "brought to the notice of the Secretary of War or of the board" should be inserted, and the limitation of expenditures should be qualified in the same way. I will move, therefore, to amend the amendment, in line 23, by striking out the words "the Secretary of War" and inserting "said board."

Mr. HAWLEY. But if they are brought to the notice of the board the board reports them to the Secretary of War.

Mr. PLUMB. I think, perhaps, it is well to put in the words "said board," leaving out "the Secretary of War." I think that is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. In line 23 it is proposed to strike out the words "the Secretary of War" and insert "said board;" so as to read:

Brought to the notice of said board.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, the word "he," in line 24, should be changed to "they."

Mr. HAWLEY. The board recommend and the Secretary buys what he pleases. He is not absolutely bound to buy.

Mr. PLUMB. That is true, but that is qualified in the first section. Nothing can be done but what he recommends, and what he practically himself does.

Mr. HAWLEY. To change the word "he" to "they" will be to buy "so much thereof as they may deem proper." He has final jurisdiction on the committee's theory.

Mr. PLUMB. I will suggest an amendment that I think will cover the Senator's criticism. I move to amend it to read:

Or so much thereof as may be deemed proper.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is right.

Mr. PLUMB. That leaves the question of authority open.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 24 it is proposed to strike out the word "he," and in line 25 to strike out "deem" and insert "be deemed;" so as to read:

Or so much thereof as may be deemed proper.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. To complete the guns now under fabrication by the Ordnance Department, and for testing the same, as follows: One 10-inch breech-loading steel gun, wire-wrapped, with longitudinal bars on Woodbridge plan, $20,000; for testing the same, $25,000; one 10-inch breech-loading steel-hooped gun, $7,500; for testing the same, $25,000; one 10-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, wire-wrapped, $1,500; for testing the same, $12,000; one 8-inch breech-loading steel-hooped gun, $5,000; for testing the same, $12,000; for testing one 12-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, steel-tubed, $20,000; for testing one 12-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, hooped and tubed with steel on the French system, $20,000; for testing one 12-inch breech-loading mortar, cast-iron, hooped with steel, $10,000; in all, $158,000.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state in regard to that amendment that the work contemplated in that section is covered completely by the preceding section, and that was the reason for striking this section out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 4, line 5, after "New York," to strike out "in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884, seven," and insert "five;" so as to read:

For the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an army gun-factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., $550,000: Provided, That not exceeding $20,000 of this sum may be used for the erection and completion of two sets of officers' quarters.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Appropriations reduces there the appropriation $200,000. It very properly strikes out the words "in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884," etc., because four years have passed since that Gun Foundry Board made its report, and it is entirely probable that some of the machinery required for the new gun foundry will be of a different and better class than they recommended. That is all very well, but I submit that the committee has erred in striking down the amount there from $750,000 to $550,000. The careful estimates show that it will require $250,000 to erect the necessary shops and permanent fixtures for the construction of guns—large establishments. It must be remembered that the building is not a mere inclosure, because it requires very heavy foundations for the lathes and boring-machines, etc., so that a large part of the cost of the building will be below ground and not show when the building is completed. The careful estimates show that it will require $250,000 to erect the necessary shops and permanent fixtures for the construction of guns, inclusive of guns of 12 inches in caliber; for the purchase of the necessary machinery and tools, as lathes, boring-mills, planers, rifling-machines, cranes, etc., $550,000 will be necessary in order to fabricate the following quantities of guns per annum, namely: ten 8-inch guns, six 10-inch guns, and four 12-inch guns—a somewhat smaller output than is specified in the Gun Foundry Board report. The total of this foots up $800,000, to which should be added, for two sets of officers' quarters, $20,000, making an aggregate of $820,000.

Under the sundry civil bill about $35,000 was appropriated for the gun-plant at Watervliet arsenal, and they have on hand some available heavy-gun plant at that arsenal, I think amounting in value to about $35,000, so that the total sum may be reduced by $70,000, to $750,000. A less sum than $250,000 will not complete the shops, and it is important for economic reasons to procure as many of the needed tools at one time as possible. If they are to contract for the requisite number of tools for this very heavy work, it is better that we should not leave $250,000 to be appropriated next year, but should embrace the tools in one large contract at one time. I should very much prefer to have the sum here remain $750,000.

Mr. PLUMB. The estimate of the War Department for that purpose is $550,000, and that was based upon the report of the Gun Foundry Board which assembled in 1884. If the Senator will recall that report, on page 50 of it is found an estimate of the cost of the plant for gun factories in these words:

Approximate cost of plant for gun factories: Guns up to 6-inch caliber, $50,000; guns from 6-inch to 12-inch caliber, $150,000; guns from 12-inch to 16-inch caliber, $350,000; buildings and shrinking-pit, $350,000.

The bill under consideration does not provide for the purchase of steel for a gun larger than a caliber of 12 inches, and it is evident that the War Department in making up this estimate simply eliminated so much of the machinery deemed necessary by the Gun Foundry Board as applied to the making of guns of 12 to 16 inch caliber. I have no doubt, however, that the estimate of the Gun Foundry Board was too low; that ultimately there will be obliged to be a plant at the Watervliet arsenal for the purpose of making a complete gun factory for the manufacture of 12-inch guns, costing from seven hundred and fifty to eight hundred thousand dollars, although it is said that there is a very considerable amount of machinery there now which will be available for this purpose.

But we were advised that the Navy Department had not been able to contract in this country yet for lathes suitable for making 12-inch guns at any such prices as they deemed proper, and the subject has gone over for the time being, and we thought there would be money enough very likely for present purposes and we would get that which was available. A large portion of the tools necessary for this factory are to be found in stock among manufacturers and which can be purchased, as picks or axes can be purchased, and therefore would not take any very great length of time, but could be got together and put to use with reference to the immediate operations of this factory, but meanwhile Congress will presently reassemble and what then may be found to answer for the expenditure of the amount of money provided in this bill can be embraced in another bill which will undoubtedly follow at the next session of Congress. Still, I have no doubt, as the Senator, says, we shall have to expend considerably more money.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator be kind enough to state whether the machinery for the manufacture of a 16-inch gun will answer also for a 12-inch gun, and whether it would not be economy to provide the larger machinery—the machinery having the greater capacity?

Mr. PLUMB. That would be true as to a portion only. We inquired about that carefully from the ordnance officers. Of course the same forging machinery would be used for both purposes (if we were going to make forgings), and some of the minor machinery, but the machinery for handling the guns and the lathes necessary would all have to be entirely different. In addition to that, it is contemplated by the Ordnance Department to build the wing of the building for the making of 16-inch guns entirely different from the part of the building which will be used for the smaller calibers. For the fabrication of a 16-inch gun according to the idea of the Ordnance Department, the operations would be carried on practically distinct, although under the same roof. They would be in a part of the building made larger and wider and provided with heavier machinery for handling, and also having separate lathes for finishing.

Mr. DOLPH. It would certainly be economy to purchase the machinery necessary for the construction of 16-inch guns at once, which may be used independently for 16-inch guns as well as any other.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not understand that that is the case, or that such machinery will be used independently. The officers object.

Mr. DOLPH. I thought the Senator said a portion of the machinery would be so used?

Mr. PLUMB. A portion of it would be, that is true; but, in regard to that point, no lathes of this kind have ever been made yet in this country. Patterns would have to be made for them. No doubt the manufacture of lathes, etc., for the construction of 12-inch guns will suggest improvements to our mechanics. It is the idea of our ordnance officers that the moment our mechanics get hold of this kind of machinery and get to manufacturing machinery for the fabrication of guns and all other things relating to this general question of defense they will make improvements of a most valuable character. There will be a gain, therefore, perhaps, in beginning with guns of the smaller sizes. At all events it will be a very long period of time before the Government will expect to make, by a very lavish expenditure of money, machinery for the manufacture of a 16-inch gun. That is not contemplated. Steel is not provided for in this gun, the limit of the caliber being 12 inches. It is also to be remembered that guns above 12 inches do not exist in any number anywhere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 4, line 16, before the word "million," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

For the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power coast-defense guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of the manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber, $2,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, as follows:

Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered, and no contract shall be made hereunder for gun steel at a greater average price per pound for each caliber than the lowest average price charged under contracts hitherto made by the Government for forgings of like caliber.

Mr. HAWLEY. A question arises there, Mr. President. The only contract made in this country for heavy gun forgings of that character has been made with the Bethlehem Steel Works by the Navy Department—I will not say the only one, but substantially the only one (because there have been some bits of work done elsewhere)—the only large contract. There was a contract made with another establishment to build an 8-inch gun, and there have been purchases made to a considerable amount and especially for the tubes—for the heaviest parts of the heaviest guns—from British manufacturers. It was indispensable. I do not know whether the proviso just read means that we shall not pay more than we have paid Whitworth & Co. or whether it means that we shall not pay more than we have paid the Bethlehem Works.

Mr. PLUMB. That ought to be amended, I think, by inserting "of American manufacturers."

Mr. HAWLEY. That would make it clearer, because they have been able to buy of others at a lower price than anybody here can make it.

Mr. PLUMB. What was in mind was the contract that the Government had recently made for steel for the use of the Navy. That steel for the use of naval guns has cost about 33 cents a pound. That is regarded as a perfectly safe limitation, and it is believed by those who have given the subject particular attention that in a short time we shall be able to get it much lower. But it was in contemplation to limit it to the price which has been paid to American manufacturers.

Mr. HALE. Should not that word "charged," in line 20, on page 5, read "paid"—"the lowest average price paid under contracts hitherto made," etc.?

Mr. PLUMB. It should be "paid." I move that it be so amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On line 20, after the word "price," it is proposed to strike out the word "charged" and insert the word "paid;" so as to make the clause read:

No contract shall be made hereunder for gun steel at a greater average price per pound for each caliber than the lowest average price paid under contracts hitherto made by the Government, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend, in line 21, by inserting after the word "Government" the words "with American manufacturers."

Mr. HAWLEY. Or it would be sufficient to add the word "American" before the word "forgings." Would not that answer?

Mr. PLUMB. That will do just as well—"for American forgings." I modify my amendment by moving to insert the word "American" between the words "for" and "forgings."

Mr. HAWLEY. That would do, but I doubt the wisdom of it. I would leave the Government free to contract, because I do not wish to pass a bill in such shape as to throw these forgings into the hands of one company that has already got the plant established. I highly respect and compliment and honor the Bethlehem Steel Works for the magnificent enterprise they have shown in investing money as they did far in advance of Government contracts, so that they will have in two or three months a plant for heavy forgings. But to limit it in this way has a tendency, at least, to throw the matter into their hands as being the only people who can bid, because the others have not the plant ready. They can say, "We will furnish you steel at 35 cents, and deliver in four months." A new man will be obliged to say, "I will furnish it at 35 or 36 cents if you wait a year for me to put the plant in."

Mr. PLUMB. We should lose undoubtedly more than we should gain if it were to have the effect to prevent competition, but I hardly think it will. The amount is large, though not so large as has been heretofore proposed; still it is large enough to induce the erection of plant for the purpose of supplying steel. The provision as worded was contained in the bill as it came from the other House, and on reflection the committee thought they would not change it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not move any amendment. I only made the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 21, after the word "for," it is proposed to insert "American;" so as to make the clause read:

Under contracts made by the Government for American forgings of like caliber.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. To go back for a moment, in line 3 of page 4, should not the clause read, "for assembling and finishing heavy ordnance," instead of "for finishing and assembling?"

Mr. PLUMB. I think not. I think the word "assembling" is used there with reference to bringing together the parts after they have been subjected to the lathe.

Mr. HALE. This is for an army gun factory. It is only a question whether it should not be "assembling and finishing."

Mr. HAWLEY. No, the fine boring, etc., is first done with the lathe, and then the men, with great delicacy, put the parts together.

Mr. HALE. "Assembling," then, is the last operation?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 4, line 30, after the word "made," to strike out "unless already so provided;" and after the word "shall," at the end of the same line, to insert "have, or;" so as to read:

The material for the guns provided for herein shall be purchased in accordance with section 3709, Revised Statutes, for which purpose the Secretary of War is authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, who shall be resident citizens of the United States, after proper advertisement, continuing not less than thirty days, in the newspapers most likely to reach the said manufacturers: Provided, That each bidder with whom such contracts shall be made shall have, or agree to erect, in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it in accordance with the contracts, and shall further agree to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of the delivery of the steel for the smaller calibers of heavy guns to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months, and that for the largest calibers, specified in the advertisement, at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contracts; and that all the tools, machines, and material for said guns shall be manufactured in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 5, line 1, after the words "purchase of," to strike out "the material for, and the manufacture of;" so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 5. For the purchase of 12-inch breech-loading rifled mortars of cast-iron, hooped with steel, of about 32,000 pounds weight, etc.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to the amendment; indeed, I am opposed to this entire section.

I will not take up the time of the Senate at this late stage of the session and upon the consideration of this bill to restate my objections to cast-iron guns and mortars and cast-iron mortars hooped with steel. I think it would be about as sensible to make an appropriation for the purchase of spears or bows and arrows for the purposes of national defense, or an appropriation for wooden guns, as to provide for the purchase of cast-iron guns at this time, when everybody admits that there are better guns, more serviceable, and of higher power, and better adapted to the purposes of defense.

There is time enough, after waiting as long as we have waited in the preparation for defending our coasts, to secure the best guns. In regard to guns constructed partly of cast-iron and partly forged steel—guns with a cast-iron body and steel hoops—my opinion is that they are no stronger than one of the metals used in their manufacture; that is to say, that these steel-hooped cast-iron mortars are no stronger than the cast-iron used in them. Then I have another objection to this amendment. The Gun Foundry Board, the Board on Fortifications and Other Defenses, and the Senate select committee, at the head of which was the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], have all reported in favor of the purchase of material for guns from private parties and the manufacture of them by the Government, and that is the policy which has been adopted under the authority of Congress for procuring guns for the Navy.

Provision is made in this bill for the purchase by contract, of private parties, of steel ingots for the manufacture of 10 and 12 inch built-up steel guns. The same boards and committee reported in favor of the manufacture of guns or the assembling of the parts by the Government at a manufactory for the Navy to be established at the Washington navy-yard and at a manufactory for the Army to be established at Watervliet, N. Y. As this bill came from the House it provided for the manufacture of 12-inch breech-loading cast-iron mortars with steel hoops by the Government, and it is fairly implied that the purchase of the material is to be made from private parties.

The first clause of the section reads as follows:

For the purchase of the materials for and the manufacture of.

That is to say, purchase by the Government of the materials for, and the manufacture by the Government of, 12-inch breech-loading rifled mortars. As the committee have amended it it provides for the purchase of the mortars themselves and clearly implies that they are not to be manufactured by the Government. The Government is to purchase the material and manufacture the 10 and 12 inch built-up steel guns, but is to purchase these rifled mortars already manufactured. Taking the two provisions together this is entirely clear. I am opposed to the amendment.

But I am opposed to both the purchase and manufacture of these mortars. If this kind of guns or mortars are to be provided I see no reason why Congress should depart as to them from the plan provided for obtaining guns for the Navy, or for providing guns for the Army; that is, the purchase of the forged steel and the manufacture of the guns by the Government. But I do not propose to discuss this matter at length at this time, having already on another occasion discussed it, and I do not suppose I will be able to prevent the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee. I believe, however, this is a dangerous departure from the plan recommended by the Board on Fortifications and other Defenses and by the Secretary of War.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment will not really change the result. The Department does not expect to make any part of these guns. It expects to have all these mortars delivered before the end of the next twelve months, before the Watervliet arsenal can be got into operation. The gun itself can be made probably at the West Point Works or at the South Boston Works, or a portion at each place, and the steel will come very probably from the Midvale Works, in Pennsylvania, and the Government will then simply shrink this steel hoop upon the cast-iron barrel.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to call the attention of the Senator——

Mr. PLUMB. One moment. We simply make the matter more apparent, that that was to be done which the Department say is inevitable; but if the Senator desires that the amendment shall not prevail I have not the slightest objection to letting the language remain as the bill came from the House.

In regard to the subject of mortars, without going into the question as to the relative merits of the gun metal, about which so much has been said, and without disputing at all what the Senator from Oregon says about steel and iron, I call his attention to the fact that the Chief of Ordnance in his last report said:

In view of the large numbers of 12-inch mortars required for coast defense, and from the fact that there are several manufacturers who can now supply mortars of the type—cast-iron banded with steel—already tested by the Department with most satisfactory results as regards endurance, I have recommended in my annual estimate the appropriation of $500,000 for the procurement of 12-inch rifled mortars of a similar type. * * *

This sum should procure from fifty to sixty mortars.

The committee reduced the estimate from $500,000 to $250,000. The Senator does not say whether he thinks the mortar is a weapon of sufficient use to warrant the purchase of it at all, but on that point I want to read what General Sheridan said about a year and a half ago:

As rifle mortars have a range of from 8,000 to 10,000 yards, they may be considered an essential of the main defense rather than an auxiliary. Large batteries of mortars should be placed in the rear of the lines of gun-pits, the calibers of these mortars being from 12 to 14 inches. As the individual accuracy of their fire is not great, they should be established in groups of about fifty, each group being fired as a unit. A sufficiently large number of groups should be provided so that a continuous fire may be showered upon an advancing fleet while it is in effective range.

And I am advised on perfectly good authority that mortars are important elements in the armament, for defensive operations, of foreign nations.

A gun of the type mentioned in this section has been experimented with at the Government proving-ground at Sandy Hook, and has been fired a very large number of rounds—I think about seven or eight hundred.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. PLUMB. Not so many?

Mr. HAWLEY. No. If the Senator refers to the one described here, "the 12-inch breech-loading mortar, cast-iron, steel-hooped, now at the Ordnance proving-ground at Sandy Hook, N. J.," it has been fired 183 times. It is the purpose of the Ordnance Department to go on and fire it 400 times before they have done with it.

Mr. PLUMB. My impression was that it had been fired a considerably larger number of rounds with a full charge, and then a considerable number also with a half charge; but at all events the officers who have tried it, those who are recognized as being as skillful as any in the department, speak of the mortar with approval. It has this advantage, that it can be supplied very soon, and in all the calculations in regard to this question of coast defenses the possession of 1,000 or 1,200 mortars has been in contemplation by the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department. They are proposing under a previous section of this bill to construct a steel mortar, which it is supposed will cost about $17,000. The cast-iron, steel-banded mortars will cost from $8,500 to $9,000, and can be produced not only so much cheaper, though that is the least element to be taken into account, but they can be produced so much quicker that it would be worth while to prepare at least a fair number. Probably under this provision we shall get about thirty. I do not think that we shall be any worse off if we have them, at all events.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Kansas, in discussing the Army appropriation bill, or the amendment offered to that bill by the Senator from Connecticut, said substantially that we should never hear a hostile shot fired on this continent. If that is the case, I do not think haste is so important that we need to provide for manufacture of inferior guns for the purpose of obtaining them within twelve months.

In regard to the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance, I was aware of his recommendation concerning these mongrel mortars, and I assert that his recommendation stands alone, without the support of any of the boards or committees that have been appointed to consider the subject. And I have an impression that the plan for these mortars originated in the Ordnance Bureau, although I would not so state as a fact. There may be some personal pride in the matter.

Referring now to the recommendation of the late General Sheridan, quoted by the Senator from Kansas, I would not say a word to detract from the just fame of General Sheridan; he was a dashing and an able cavalry officer. I do not know what special attention he had given to the question of coast defenses. I saw at one time in a newspaper a statement which purported to have been made by him in regard to the defenses of our coast, which was substantially that if we had modern guns they were all we needed, that they could be put down in the sands anywhere and effectively used for harbor defense. If that statement emanated from him it showed that he was not informed upon the question of coast defenses.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] once reiterated that statement in this Chamber.

I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to another matter with reference to this proposed purchase of mortars. I do not care what the Chief of Ordnance or the Secretary of War might have proposed to do under the bill as it came from the House, it did not authorize the purchase of manufactured mortars. It authorized the purchase of material and the manufacture of the mortars. But is there anything in this section as proposed to be amended to prevent the purchase of a gun from a manufacturer of Great Britain or France? There is in the section no provision that the gun itself shall be manufactured in the United States nor that the material shall be produced in the United States, and I have not been able to find any such proposition in the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I did think I would pass by these two paragraphs, or this whole section, without any remarks, but I think I ought not to do so.

It is proposed here to get about one hundred and thirty cast-iron mortars, about thirty of them to be hooped with steel, which adds to their strength and makes them more valuable. A great deal has been said here, eloquently and truly, about opening these things to competition—to the skill of the country, and inviting all men to manufacture. Now, there is nothing in section 5 or in section 6, the first paragraph of which pertains to mortars, inviting any competition or any bids. The Department is authorized to buy $250,000 worth of cast-iron hooped mortars, and authorized conditionally, in section 6, to expend $650,000 more, a total of $900,000, for an inferior weapon. I do not mean to say that a cast-iron rifled mortar, whether breech-loading or muzzle-loading, or whether hooped or unhooped, is not of some value. It is of some value. The modern mortar is not the mortar we see in the navy-yards around here. It is really a short cannon. It stands up several feet in the air; it is a very heavy gun—a short, thick gun. I do not pretend to say that a cast-iron hooped mortar will not stand fire, but I say that no ordnance department in the world would think of building such weapons and going ahead to renew the defenses of a country with such a weapon. But rather than not have anything, rather than depend on the old round mortar, which was a very uncertain weapon, as I know, for I have handled many a one, I would consent to take some cast-iron steel-hooped mortars; but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we do not in this bill provide for the construction of one hundred breech-loading rifled mortars. In section 5 the Department is authorized to expend $250,000 to buy them, going where it pleases, and there is nothing said about bids for them. The ordinary careful safeguards of the law are dispensed with. This 12-inch breech-loading mortar now at Sandy Hook is furnished by the South Boston Iron Works, and I suppose it is contemplated to invite the South Boston Iron Works to make the thirty more for $250,000. Then section 6 says:

Whenever any party shall present for test a complete cast-iron breech-loading mortar of 12 inches caliber, of about 32,000 pounds weight—

The same weight as the cast-iron steel-hooped mortar of the previous section—with a proper supply of ammunition therefor, not exceeding two hundred rounds, such mortar shall be tested in the presence of the party presenting the same, and should it be shown to the satisfaction of the board by such tests to be equal in accuracy, range, power, endurance, material, and general efficiency to the 12-inch cast-iron steel-hooped breech-loading mortar now at Sandy Hook—

The one which has been fired one hundred and eighty-three times—the mortar and ammunition shall be paid for, including cost of transportation, and contract be made for a further supply of not less than fifty and not more than one hundred.

Who will furnish that mortar? The South Boston Iron Works is ready, and can do it before anybody else can or will. They will furnish one of those mortars. I doubt very much if they can present a mortar as good as the one hooped with steel and having the same accuracy, but they are the only parties that can do it who are ready. This looks like giving $900,000 to a particular concern for a gun that the civilized powers do not care to duplicate. That is the truth. I do not like to say it, but it is the truth. As far as I can read this bill with a telescope I can read "South Boston" in it as far as I can read anything. Still I would rather have these mortars than nothing.

Mr. GORMAN. The statement of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is entirely erroneous. I have no doubt that he has not critically examined the bill, and that that is the reason why he has made the statement.

The provision is simply this and nothing more: Manufacturers, and not only one but more than one firm, in the United States believe that they can make a cast-iron mortar of the same weight and endurance that shall have every quality of the standard mortar now at Sandy Hook, which the War Department thinks the best in existence, and which is bound with steel—that they can furnish such a mortar of cast-steel or of cast-iron at half the price, and this section provides that if there be any firm in the United States, one or twenty, that will at its or their own expense, without the cost to the Government of a dollar, produce such a gun, and in addition furnish to the Government $10,000 worth of ammunition to try it, or two hundred rounds, and then, if it comes up to the standard of the test-gun now at Sandy Hook, the Government agrees to take not less than fifty nor more than one hundred, and we shall save on the transaction one-half the amount on the steel-hooped mortar.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I say right there——

Mr. GORMAN. Just one moment. It is true, I believe, that there are, as it stands to-day, two establishments in this country that would attempt to compete for such a gun—the South Boston Iron Works and the West Point Foundry.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why not, then, say "the Ordnance Department shall advertise for 100 cast-iron mortars of an average weight of about 32,000 pounds, to be capable of passing such tests as the Ordnance Department may lay down," or make the test whatever you please; or provide that the board referred to shall lay down the requirements, and then ask for bids, just as you ask for bids in all other cases, as the law provides that you shall. Ask who will build, for the least price, 100 cast-iron, breech-loading mortars of a certain standard of excellency.

This does not say that. It says whenever any party presents one of these mortars, which he can do (he may have it ready now for all I know), contracts shall be made with that one party; but suppose four present themselves, does it mean that each one shall have a contract for one hundred?

Mr. GORMAN. No, it is limited to one hundred. There is not an officer of the Ordnance Department, and I may say generally not one of the Army experts, who believes that the conditions placed in this amendment can be complied with by anybody; but there are two manufacturing establishments who believe that they can succeed in complying with the conditions, and if there are a hundred others they have the same opportunity to present their guns and have them tested.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator——

Mr. GORMAN. One word more. The Government will not be compelled to purchase under that provision unless the guns come up to the standard.

Mr. HAWLEY. But suppose that each one of a half a dozen firms furnished a mortar that comes up to the standard, is each one to have a contract for one hundred?

Mr. GORMAN. Unquestionably not. In the discretion of the board the firm presenting the best will have the contract. I think the Senator will find by careful reading that that is the interpretation. If the statements of such an officer as Captain Butler, who has argued all this question out, be correct—and he differs from all his comrades except one or two in high command—this is a proper thing for us to do. He says it is feasible, that it is possible. If it is, the Government runs no risk whatever, but saves half a million dollars. Under the provision as it stands the authorities are required to advertise for bids under section 3709 of the Revised Statutes. I think the provision is such as to give everybody an opportunity without cost to the Government.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator will look a little further down in Captain Butler's article he will find that he is an advocate of steel; and he would have nothing else but steel if he could have his own way. All the officers are of that way of thinking. Captain Butler is like some of the rest, he will take the best he can get, but I do not think that Captain Butler said that he approved of this. I do not think he will say that. Nevertheless it is better than nothing.

Mr. PLUMB. There is one thing that the Senator from Connecticut ought, I think, to bear in mind in discussing this matter. What he means by a steel gun is, of course, a built-up steel gun. I think he understands that considerable attention has been directed to the manufacture of cast-steel guns, that some people who have given the matter considerable attention think it practical to make a gun of that kind which will have all the merits and none of the demerits of the built-up guns. It is also true that by reason of recent discoveries there is every prospect that cast-iron is to be so treated with aluminum as to make it a great deal better metal, stronger, more durable, and closer grained, possessing more of the qualities necessary for the ideal gun-metal than iron has heretofore had according to any authority, and there are anticipations that it will be even better; and yet I suppose that it would come under the designation of "cast-iron" according to this bill. So, then, in entering upon this expenditure, if this should be adopted, the Government would be giving a stimulus to the production of a better grade of iron by reason of its treatment with aluminum which may lead to very important results.

Mr. DOLPH. I meant to say to the Senator from Kansas, when I was on the floor before, that if he threw the responsibility upon me of taking the bill as it came from the House, or taking it as amended by the Senate committee, I should certainly take him at his word and take it as it came from the House.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well.

Mr. DOLPH. But I again call attention to the fact that there is nothing in this section or in the bill requiring that the mortars shall be manufactured in the United States or that they shall be furnished by citizens of the United States. The same criticism applies to section 6, which provides for the purchase of cast-iron mortars and of steel built-up breech-loading guns. In all the legislation heretofore, I think, had upon this subject as to guns for both the Army and for the Navy we have required all materials to be of domestic manufacture, and I would suggest that an amendment be made, either to this section or to the bill, so as to cover everything provided for by the bill, and require the guns and mortars to be made in this country. I think this point was overlooked by the committee.

I wish to say with regard to mortars, also, that I do not think they are so important as the Senator from Kansas evidently thinks they are. They are of but secondary importance. Their range is limited. They fire in the air and are designed to drop a shell on the deck of a vessel, and as a matter of course they can not be so effective as a gun having a horizontal fire or nearly so. An enemy's vessel could get within range of such a battery before it was of any use. My own impression is that it would be wiser, instead providing first for mortars, to provide first for guns of the greatest range. I should like to see an appropriation made for even a larger gun than 16-inch guns. I would like to see an appropriation made for a gun of 20 inches—larger than anything manufactured in the United States or in any foreign country to my knowledge.

I can not see why there should be such extraordinary economy in the matter of appropriations for coast defenses, while we have been so liberal in appropriations for the Navy. I have stated before, and I repeat what I have said upon other occasions, that I do not believe it is practicable to defend our coasts by a navy. We have already provided for three armored ships at great cost. That, in my judgment, is three too many. It would be more judicious to have expended the money for fast cruisers carrying effective guns and in coast defenses.

We never can defend the coasts of the United States with a navy; there are too many points to be defended. An effective defense by a navy would require at least as many guns at every port to be defended as could be brought against that port by the enemy, and as we could not know where the enemy would attack we must be prepared to defend each port on both coasts of the United States if we are to defend our coasts by a navy.

Now, the comparative cost of defending our coasts by navy and by coast defenses, land fortifications, is decidedly in favor of the latter. I will send to the desk to be read a statement made by a gentleman thoroughly informed on this subject as to the cost of one of the vessels of the Navy which has gone out of service—her original cost and the cost of maintaining her.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement will be read from the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

As an instance of the cost of making and keeping of war vessels perpetually in service, we need give but a single instance, and for this we will take the case of the Tennessee, a vessel about the size of one of our new cruisers, but which cost more, as she was made twenty years ago.

The Secretary states the cost of this ship, in 1867, to be $1,856,075.81; the cost of repairs put upon her from 1869 to 1875, at $1,443,513.21; and for repairs from 1875 to 1887, $577,716.17; making together for first cost and repairs, $3,877,305.19. The interest on these sums at 5 per cent. is $3,000,000, making, for the cost and repairs, with interest thereon, a total of $6,877,305.19. She brought, when sold in 1887, $34,525, leaving as the net cost for construction, repairs, and interest, $6,842,780.19.

The Secretary states that this vessel was in active service about ten years. The complement of officers and men for such a vessel is about four hundred. The yearly pay of these officers and men, together with their expenses, their clothes, rations, etc., and a fair allowance for the equipment of the vessel, for the stores, etc., will amount to fully $360,000 per year, which for ten years would be $3,600,000, which, added to the above cost of vessel, repairs, and interest, makes over $9,442,000 as the cost of keeping this vessel in active service about ten years, or $944,000 a year, a sum which exceeds one-half of the first cost of the vessel and a sum which is almost double the cost it will be to us to keep these twenty 20-inch guns in service, and a sum fully equal to the yearly cost of keeping the sixty 14, 16, and 20 inch guns in service, without our ever paying for them at all.

It will be noticed that no armament was provided in the above estimated cost of keeping the Tennessee in service, but in leaving this out we did not leave out much, as her armament was of little account.

The reference to the 16 and 20 inch guns is to a provision in the House bill which was not reported. I was not aware it was there when I sent up the article to be read.

I also send up a quotation relating to armored ships to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In regard to this 7,500-ton armored cruiser to be built at a cost of $3,500,000, we must not only consider this cost but that of its armament, equipment, and what it will cost to keep it in service.

First for construction	$3,500,000
Armament, equipment, interest on a portion of these sums during the four years of building, say	1,500,000
Making cost of vessel with armament, equipment, and interest to time of going into commission, which may here be taken as first cost	5,000,000

If her life is taken at twenty years the interest on this sum at 2½ per cent. is for twenty years, $2,500,000 more. If we assume the repairs for these twenty years to cost 60 per cent. of first cost of vessel as armed and equipped we add $3,000,000 more to her expense, and we may add for interest on this sum at 2½ per cent. for, say, an average term of only eight years, $600,000.

Such a vessel to be kept in commission ten years with 600 officers and men, will cost for their pay, expenses, ship's supplies, etc., fully $540,000 per year, or $5,400,000.

Now, add to the first cost of the vessel armed and put in commission these several sums, which we must pay, and we get a grand total of (first cost)	$5,000,000
Interest twenty years	2,500,000
Repairs, first cost	3,000,000
Interest of repairs, eight years	600,000
Pay of officers and men, ship's supplies, etc., ten years	5,400,000
In all	16,500,000

Or, $1,650,000 per year for each of the ten years she may be expected to be in service. A very large sum, but less than one-third the cost of the ship and armament when put in commission—instead of over 50 per cent. as we find has actually been paid in the case of the Tennessee.

Mr. HALE. Who is this gentleman?

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection to stating who the gentleman is. It is Mr. Emery, who invented the Emery testing-machine, and who is a civil engineer of undoubted standing.

Mr. HALE. He seems to have quite a remarkable system of mathematics.

Mr. DOLPH. It seems to be all right, and I give it for what it is worth and for the purpose of emphasizing what I desire to say in regard to the apparent economy of Congress in the matter of coast defenses. I think we have begun at the wrong end of this matter. I am in favor of building up a navy. I am in favor of providing fast cruisers, armed with effective guns, to act as commerce-destroyers in case of war with foreign nations.

As I said, I do not believe it is at all practicable to defend our coasts with a navy and that the three armed ships which Congress has now authorized are just three too many; at least until we have provided a system of coast defense it is neither wise nor economical to build such ships. When we undertake to provide a system of coast defenses I think we ought to have a definite plan and understand what we are going to do before we commence, and should provide the best known appliances for defense, and in determining what they are we must be guided by the committees and by the boards which have investigated and reported upon these subjects. When that is done we can not make the appropriations too large. Large appropriations are economical, appropriations that when the work is once commenced will enable it to be conducted to a final completion without interruption.

It seems to me that what we are now doing, providing appropriations for dynamite guns, for cast-iron mortars, and for hybrid mortars with cast-iron bodies and hoops of steel, and all this, is simply diverting the appropriations from the general plan which has been recommended, and which is believed by the great body of the engineers and officers of the Army to be the best means of defense, is making poor progress towards coast defense. I repeat, we have begun at the wrong end. We are making large appropriations for purposes which will not be adequate to the defense of our coasts, and very meager appropriations for those things which we ought to provide.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am in favor of liberal appropriations for fortifications, and think that Congress has been somewhat remiss in this direction; but we want also and luckily are getting good appropriations for a navy. One of the things that we are doing and have been doing for the last half dozen years is to provide against just such cases as have been cited by the Senator from Oregon in reference to the old Tennessee. She has cost a mint of money, counting her original cost, the repairs laid out upon her, and the expense of maintaining her; and we are building no more such ships. When she went out nothing of the kind took her place. The modern ships that we are building, whether made of steel or composite material, whether armored or otherwise, are not ships that will consume the Treasury by large expensive repairs during the years of their life. That will be a great saving.

I agree somewhat with the Senator from Oregon about the expense and the present utility of these great armored ships, but I believe it to be better to have a few of them.

I do not think there is much force in the comparison between a ship in its cost in the future and fortifications as indicated by the figures which were given by the Senator from Oregon. Of course it costs more to maintain a ship of war after she is built than it does a gun after it is built. You might as well say that a man should not keep a horse and carriage and should put out his money upon monumental tombstones, because it costs more to maintain a horse and carriage than it does to maintain a monument after it is put up. Of course it does. It does not cost very much to maintain a gun after you have built it. It does not require many men to look after it or to manage it. It does not consume food, provisions, and clothing, and of course the main expense is reached when you have built it.

Not so with a ship; build the best ship that you can, that it is possible to devise by human ingenuity and modern improvement, and when she is set afloat in the waters she begins to be expensive from that very day. That is a thing that can not be helped. You can make no comparison between her expense and the expense of a fortification or of a great gun. The guns themselves are immensely expensive. It would be a surprise to any Senator who has not looked into the subject to find how much money is represented in a single great gun, some costing more than $100,000; but it is one of the situations. I think a 16-inch gun—I am not certain about my figures—costs more than $100,000.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that a 16-inch gun will cost $175,000 in Europe.

Mr. HALE. I may not have the amount large enough. Our people believe they can make guns, after they have established these plants, as cheaply as they can be made in Europe, and perhaps more cheaply.

Mr. PLUMB. This statement is made on the authority of the Ordnance Department that a 14-inch gun would cost $93,632, a 16-inch gun $144,000, and a 20-inch gun $289,000; but that statement is challenged by gentlemen who claim to be better informed.

Mr. HALE. I had the figures that the Senator has just given in mind. A 16-inch gun costs more than $100,000.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will suggest to him that the figures as to Krupp's 16-inch gun show that it costs $174,440, and everybody knows it could not be built in this country for the same money.

Mr. HALE. It could not at first. I did not propose to go into the immense guns that range away beyond that. Nobody will ever see the day when a 16-inch gun—and perhaps that is as large as we shall build—will cost less than $100,000; perhaps not less than $150,000; but we are confronted with a situation, as the President says, and not with a theory; and if we are to defend our coasts and our great cities we have got to have guns and ships and fortifications, and a kind of floating battery that I believe has never yet been developed, which will be better than any other kind of ship or any other kind of fortification.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to say in answer to the Senator from Maine that a gun mounted on shore is several times more effective than a gun afloat. It costs a great deal less in the first instance. Then, when it is mounted upon a fortification or in a pit you can cover it up and it will stand for a hundred years with very little expense, whereas the life of your floating battery, your ship, upon an average is, say, twenty years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to strike out certain words in section 5. The amendment will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5, line 1, after the words "purchase of," it is proposed to strike out "the material for, and the manufacture of."

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 5, line 7, after the words "New Jersey," to insert "said mortars to be subject to inspection in all stages;" and in line 8, after the word "stages," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "two hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

For the purchase of the material for, and the manufacture of, 12-inch breech-loading rifled mortars of cast-iron, hooped with steel, of about 32,000 pounds weight, similar to and equal in range, power, and accuracy of fire to the 12-inch breech-loading mortar, cast-iron, steel-hooped, now at the Ordnance proving-ground, Sandy Hook, N. J., said mortars to be subject to inspection in all stages, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 9, after the word "dollars," to strike out "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with existing laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. Does the Senator from Kansas desire that the last amendment should prevail?

Mr. PLUMB. We have made a general direction about the expenditures in the first section of the bill. That covers that point. I will propose later on in the bill an amendment covering the point made by the Senator about the place where this material should be acquired.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert a new section as section 6, which the Secretary proceeded to read, as follows:

SEC. 6. Whenever any party shall present for test a completed cast-iron breech-loading mortar of 12 inches caliber, of about 32,000 pounds weight, with a proper supply of ammunition therefor, not exceeding two hundred rounds, such mortar shall be tested in the presence of the party presenting the same, and should it be shown to the satisfaction of the board by such tests to be equal in accuracy, range, power, endurance, material, and general efficiency to the 12-inch cast-iron steel-hooped breech-loading mortar now at Sandy Hook, the mortar and ammunition shall be paid for, including cost of transportation, and contract be made for a further supply of not less than fifty and not more than one hundred, at such reasonable cost as the board herein provided for shall determine, not to exceed $6,500 each. The entire number to be delivered in one year from date of contract. Said mortar and all which may be contracted for under this provision shall be subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture.

Mr. HAWLEY. The first part of the section provides for a test of two hundred rounds at the expense of the manufacturer. That will not be the number of rounds that the board will require, I am pretty sure, because it is requiring of the first mortar, the one now on the ground, referred to in section 5, four hundred rounds. I would move an amendment, except that this board, if this should become a law, will undoubtedly require every mortar to be fired four hundred times, but perhaps only two hundred times at the expense of the manufacturer.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think that is material. The point of putting that in was that we could not have on hand a large supply of ammunition which probably we should not need. In other words, there could only be furnished the amount deemed necessary for experimenting.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have expressed my dissatisfaction with this character of legislation; but I have said I would rather have a cast-iron mortar than none. That is all I wish to say about it. I do not believe in any of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the section proposed to be inserted will be continued.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading as follows:

Whenever any party shall present for test a completed single-charge breech-loading steel gun of 10 or 12 inches caliber, with the proper supply of ammunition for the test of the same, such gun shall, in the presence of the party presenting it, be subjected to such tests as the board shall have prescribed; and should such gun be shown to the satisfaction of the board by such tests to fulfill the requirements previously prescribed in respect to accuracy, range, power endurance, and general efficiency, the gun and ammunition shall be paid for at a fair valuation, including cost of transportation, and contract shall be made at a price reasonable in the opinion of the board, with the party presenting the best of such guns, for a further supply of similar guns, to be subjected to the usual service test before acceptance, the experimental gun and all guns purchased hereunder to be subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture, as follows, namely: For not less than fifty 10-inch steel guns; and for not less than fifty 12-inch steel guns.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is another extraordinary provision. Whenever the Government desires to have private manufacturers furnish it anything whatever it is a general rule that it shall advertise, specifying minutely the qualifications, the requisites of the article in question, and shall invite the manufacturers of such articles to compete. This does nothing of the kind. It is an entire departure.

I shall make less trouble about this section than I would if I thought there was any possibility of anything resulting from it. But just look at the character of it:

Whenever any party shall present for test a completed single-charge breech-loading steel gun of 10 or 12 inches caliber, with the proper supply of ammunition for the test of the same, such gun shall—be tried and if it be satisfactory the man shall have a contract for from fifty to one hundred guns of 10 or 12 inch caliber. In order to make one of these guns it is necessary for a manufacturer to expend not less than a million and a half of dollars. Is anybody in the world going to expend that sum of money in a costly, elaborate plant to make a steel gun for the Government, the acceptance of which is altogether uncertain? Is he going to make that with the uncertain hope that he may get a contract for a hundred of these 10 or 12 inch guns? Is there anything in the history of scores of contractors for iron-clad ships, ships of all classes, and war supplies of various descriptions, that should encourage any manufacturer to such simple and childlike experiments?

I do not think there is a manufacturer in the world who will put up his plant for that purpose, and there is only one concern in the country that can make a gun or will be able within a year to make a gun of that description.

This is an entire departure from the universal policy of the Government, and one, in my opinion, unfair to the contractors and the great steel-men of the country and unfair to the Government. Why not say "We want so many guns, who bids?" and let any manufacturer say, "I can not spend a million and a half of dollars in the making of these guns unless you give me such and such a price; I will not then get my money back, but I shall have my costly plant on hand for further commercial uses and I will get something out of it, and possibly, I hope, I may make a steady business out of it, but I will not build one gun for you to try, with no promise that you will ever give me another job like it."

Why put such legislation upon the statute-book? Every practical man tells me it is good for nothing. I think the committee itself will say what the Senator from Maryland said with regard to the previous provision for one hundred cast-iron mortars, that the restrictions and qualifications are such that it is not believed by anybody, by any ordnance officer or any man familiar with the subject, that it will be done; but he thinks there are two concerns in the country that will try those cast-iron mortars. That is a comparatively small experiment. It is nothing to cast a few tons of cast-iron; it is nothing, comparatively nothing, to put 16 tons or 20 or 25 tons of cast-iron into one casting and make a mortar; but it is a tremendous work to build up the million and a half dollars of plant necessary to make one experimental steel rifle of 12 inches.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to something further in regard to section 6. As has already been said by the Senator from Connecticut, there is no competition provided for here. It provides:

Whenever any party shall present for test a completed cast-iron breech-loading mortar of 12 inches caliber, of about 32,000 pounds weight, with a proper supply of ammunition therefor, not exceeding two hundred rounds, such mortar shall be tested in the presence of the party presenting the same, and should it be shown to the satisfaction of the board by such tests to be equal in accuracy, range, power, endurance, material, and general efficiency to the 12-inch cast-iron steel-hooped breech-loading mortar now at Sandy Hook—

Mortars of that character shall be purchased.

I have already stated that in my judgment the cast-iron steel-hooped mortar is not the best gun. It is only as strong as one of the metals contained in it, probably the cast iron, but in this provision a cast-iron, steel-hooped mortar is made the standard of excellence.

Whenever any party produces a gun of a given weight and caliber that is equal to the gun already on hand, one of those mongrel guns, then we are to purchase the gun and others like it. We do not say we will purchase the best gun that is offered or the best gun that any party offers, but that we will take a superior gun to the mongrel gun at Sandy Hook, and will purchase such guns whenever a party offers—the first party that offers—although this cast-iron mortar may be already constructed.

As soon as it is offered, if it is equal in material and endurance and efficiency to the 12-inch cast-iron steel-hooped breech-loading mortar at Sandy Hook, then the Government is to purchase a quantity of such guns. There is no opportunity for competition. The standard fixed is a gun already constructed and in the possession of the Government at Sandy Hook. We propose to take guns of that efficiency and power, whether they are the best guns of the kind or not.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me say with regard to what the Senator from Oregon has presented that we have given in this bill the money necessary to make what is called a type mortar of steel. Following the theory of the Ordnance Department, no steel mortar will be purchased nor would the Department purchase any steel mortar until the type of gun it purchased had been made and tested. It will occupy two or three years of time, in all human probability, to make this type gun; certainly two years. That is an experimental gun. In other words, they are to determine just the kind of gun we ought to have in order to realize the greatest degree of efficiency. It will therefore be two years before we can enter on the manufacture of steel mortars. In the mean time the Department has provided a type cast-iron mortar, steel-hooped, to wit, the one at Sandy Hook, and that has been tested to an extent which makes it desirable, according to the Department, that it should have more possessing that same degree of efficiency. Following that theory, we simply say that if any one will bring and furnish to us a gun at a price $2,500 more than the gun at Sandy Hook or others like it can be purchased for we will let them furnish them. It is a mere temporary expedient, I admit. The Department do not regard this as the best, but they have got the merit of knowing exactly what they will do.

The Senator said a few moments ago that I had said in a previous debate on this subject that I did not think there would be a hostile gun fired on this continent again. That is my opinion; but I do not expect to overcome the adverse opinion of the Senate. So far as I have been concerned in the preparation of this bill, I have been instructed in the first place by the vote of the Senate, I have been instructed by the views of the Ordnance Department and of General Schofield, and I have been instructed by the feeling in the country, which has manifested itself in various ways in favor of doing something, and so far as I can I have labored to bring this bill within the compass represented by these various opinions of which I have spoken, and I believe, taking the common opinion in regard to the necessity of doing something, that there will be a greater feeling of safety than there is now about New York Harbor, at all events, and in other places, if mortars might be placed in them and were there to-day.

So, I only stand for this as in the line of that which accords with what is deemed to be the best judgment of those who are most competent to express an opinion about it, that relating to steel, and on that other line of doing something as early as possible of a kind which is not the very best possible that can be done, but is, according to that same opinion, better than nothing.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator did not understand me exactly, I think. If we are going to take cast-iron mortars, why not get the best? Suppose it should turn out that I am correct, that a cast-iron body with steel hoops is not as good as all steel or all iron or all of one metal. Why not advertise and let parties come in and the board take the best gun that is offered, provided that it shall not be of less efficiency and power and shall not be of inferior material to the gun at Sandy Hook?

Mr. PLUMB. For the reason that this is a temporary expedient. We are proceeding upon the theory of purchasing guns which shall be in accord with the type that has been used for this character of guns. It is not known that it will be deemed advisable to open up this general subject to manufacturers of guns with the idea that we are to purchase of them indefinitely, as is expected in the latter part of this section providing for the purchase of guns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the section proposed to be inserted will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not care about participating in this debate, particularly on the special merits of the proposition that is before the Senate, but I think it is perhaps my duty to say a word about the question of our progressing in the direction of getting cast-steel or cast-iron heavy guns. They are, of course, very much less expensive than wrought guns. They will not cost on an average, I suppose, more than one-half the money.

I wish to be able to demonstrate now, when we are starting in our coast fortifications and in the building and arming of a navy, that we can make as good or better guns and mortars than are made anywhere else at half the cost. It is a matter that is very well worthy of our attention. Without pretending to know much about it, I have had some little observation on the subject of the strength of cast and wrought metals, and I go upon the theory that nature does her work better than art can do it in respect of giving strength to metals through the crystallization or natural formation that is designed for them.

I believe if you take a ton of iron and free it from all the impurities and get it into that condition of liquefaction where you can cast it without its having occlusions of air, where the entire body of the cast will be free from all interruptions by what are known as air-holes or blow-holes, and if you will allow it to arrange its crystallization in that sort of slow progress which nature itself has employed in the production of metals, I suppose you get a stronger metal than any human hand can make by any machinery that can be devised, and one that is safer, more homogeneous, and less liable to cracks and interruptions and breaks than any other metal that can be made.

So I have always believed that iron brought into the condition of steel, iron which possesses the requisite amount of carbon to make it steel—for that is the only difference we know of between iron and steel—when it is cast in a degree or state of fluidity which will permit the contact of the crystals of that metal to be brought in connection, and then when it is allowed to cool gradually so that the crystallization will arrange itself in a natural way, we shall get a stronger metal than any man can make with any kind of machinery or any perfection of art; and I think that is the prevailing opinion of men who are now engaged in the higher ranges and branches of metallurgy.

If that is all so, there is no reason why we should at this moment of time abandon our effort to get guns, the project of getting guns, either of cast-iron or cast-steel, but the greatest reason why we should continue our experiments in that direction, for the mechanical and metallurgical world is coming around to the proposition which I am stating now, and we have had some rather striking examples of it in recent castings that were made, I believe, in Pittsburgh, which are being turned down in the navy-yard here, at our gun factory. I understand it is expected that a gun which is in the lathe there now will be turned out in respect of its tensile strength, its breaking strength, in fact all the strength that resists expansion, to be as good a piece of metal as was ever made. It will not be very long before we have the means of determining whether that is so or not.

That one experiment—the fact that we are able to put in a lathe in that Government gun foundry a billet of cast steel of such proportions and such compactness as would justify the belief that it will turn out a first-class gun, perhaps a gun of unparalleled strength—that fact ought not only to encourage us, but it ought to admonish us that we should not now abandon these efforts either in respect of iron guns or steel guns.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] alluded to a recent process or discovery of the benefits of aluminum. He did not say that the knowledge of the benefits of aluminum in the casting of iron or steel was recent, for it is very old, and the effects are marked and they are very conspicuous. They strengthen the metal, they purify it, and they protect it against rusting. But the use of aluminum in making fine castings of steel or iron is an ancient thing; perhaps very much older than we know of now. But recent experiments and the advance of science have developed the fact that aluminum can be obtained very cheaply. You can obtain it out of almost any ordinary clay in the United States and in sufficient quantities to have the effect you desire to have in making castings. What is that? The simplest effect in the world. It is to liquefy the castings; liquefy the metal to that degree that it pours like water, and in pouring into a cast the air rises to the surface and there are no occlusions or blow-holes in it, but you get your metal pure and resort to the necessary means of getting out of it the phosphorus or sulphur or whatever refractory agent may be in it, and then put in the right amount of carbon to make it steel, and then liquefy it by the use of aluminum, and then cast it, and there can be no reason stated why that ought not to be the strongest form in which that metal can be produced.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me interrupt the Senator there a moment to ask him a question. I speak to him as a person possessing some authority on this subject by reason of his familiarity with it, and of the investigations he himself has made, and I will ask him if one of the effects of the introduction of aluminum into the molten cast-iron is not to drive out very largely if not wholly the impurities and refractory substances, such as phosphorus, sulphur, and other things which contribute to make the iron short, to use a mechanical term, and to make out of it a high grade of steel?

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt that is so. I have no doubt the use of aluminum in the casting of metal, by putting it, for instance, in the bottom of a ladle, will have the effect of so liquefying the metal as that it will expel the impurities, and they rise to the surface in the form of slag and swim on the top of the ladle, and, as the Senator suggests, will approximate the production of steel in the sense that pure iron makes better steel than impure iron. It purifies the iron by this process of extraordinary liquefaction.

Now, when the world is about to step right out and grasp this subject, the merits of which have been so long known, and to grasp it as a practical matter because of the cheapness of the application of aluminum from ordinary clays in castings, this is no time for us to abandon these experiments. It is the right time to make the experiments in that particular direction, I should say.

Of course whoever undertakes to make a gun under the provisions of this amendment will be very careful, I should say, to get the very best metal he can possibly get, and in obtaining it to use all the methods that lead in that direction to secure the result. It is to his interest to do it, because if his gun does not stand the trial, if his mortar explodes or does not wear well under fire, he loses the whole of his investment. More than that, I understand the ammunition is to be supplied, and the sum of $10,000 worth perhaps is to be supplied for the purpose of testing the durability and tensile strength and power to resist strain that these mortars are to be subjected to.

If you have got a strong body for a mortar the difference between a rifled mortar and a smooth-bore mortar is merely the expense of grooving or the rifling. In addition to what would be the resistance of a smooth wall in the fire of a missile of any kind you have to have a gun, then, strong enough of course to make up for the resistance of the necessary amount of powder to be used in expelling the missile from a grooved gun than from one which is not grooved. But who ever heard of a mortar exploding? If there is an instance of that kind anywhere I have never known it. I do not believe that a mortar which is well constructed out of good material can be exploded. So far as durability and reliability are concerned, I think we might just as well trust an iron mortar as a steel mortar, or one that is steel bound, because the expansive force is perhaps not more than 20 tons to the inch, and that almost any good quality of iron will stand in a gun that is 12 or 14 feet long.

Therefore there is no danger in making this effort; and if we can reduce the cost of these mortars from $12,000 to $6,000 or $6,500 of course we must do it; we can fortify the country at one-half the expense so far as the use of mortars is concerned. I understand that these breech-loading rifled mortars are getting to be very precise guns, and that they have a range perhaps of something like 10,000 or 12,000 yards.

Here is a gun not to be disregarded or discarded; and if we can make an experiment and test the matter, as it seems to have been thoroughly tested already at Sandy Hook by a gun of similar construction and similar material, only I believe it is steel-bound—if we can make this experiment and test the matter now on these very favorable conditions, it seems to me that we ought to do it. We ought to be able to save to the Government of the United States, if we can do it, half of the cost of these mortars. We have an immense coast to defend and we shall want a great many guns first and last, if we put it in a state of actual defense, or rather if we put the guns where they are available upon their carriages, and then we go with our spades and build the very best breastworks that can be made by throwing up earth and sand. If that is to be our course of fortification we can save enormously to this country by having cast-iron guns, if they are good enough mortars; and I suppose in the test of one of them in connection with the tests which have been made already of the one at Sandy Hook we should be able pretty well to determine whether it be necessary to go further.

It seems to me that that is really the only open door of experiment, for we have tried compression. I do not mean that we have done it, but Krupp has, Armstrong has, and others. We have tried these immense compressors; we have tried hammers and everything of that sort so as to get up a homogeneous metal for a built-up gun of steel, and we find in the experiments that have been made at various places that they are not the safest guns in the world. There are iron guns in existence to-day which have done twenty times the work of the steel guns made by Mr. Krupp which have exploded. The iron gun is still good. A good many of the Dahlgren and the Rodman guns are in existence now and just as strong as they can be. They are just as strong as they ever were after having been fired an immense number of times—I forget now how many, but perhaps a thousand times. So we must not merely for the following of a fashion discard an opportunity of making a final experiment upon this thing when it can be done as cheaply as is proposed to be done in this bill.

At first I thought I was in favor of having this House bill passed just as it came over, for the reason that when the House want to do anything in this direction I am in favor of meeting them on half-way ground and making as many steps towards the point as we can get, but I think that this is a valuable amendment to the bill. If we have only two or three establishments in the United States that can make them, it is our misfortune. I suppose that they can be made after all as cheaply in the United States as they can be made in Germany and in England, and if we can get them at a fair price it seems to me that is all that ought to be required.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that this country ought to be placed in a better condition of defense, both as to the strength of the Navy and the improvement of our fortifications, as well as the preparation for building a sufficient number of a better quality of guns than we have. Looking at the sixth section of the bill I desire to call attention to the question as to whether it will render any aid in securing additional means of defense. The first clause in the sixth section provides that—

Whenever any party shall present for a test a completed cast-iron breech-loading mortar of 12 inches caliber, of about 32,000 pounds weight, with a proper supply of ammunition therefor, not exceeding two hundred rounds, such mortar shall be tested in the presence of the party presenting the same, and should it be shown to the satisfaction of the board by such tests to be equal in accuracy, range, power, endurance, material, and general efficiency to the 12-inch cast-iron steel-hooped breech-loading mortar now at Sandy Hook, the mortar and ammunition shall be paid for, including cost of transportation, and contract be made for a further supply of not less than fifty and not more than one hundred, at such reasonable cost as the board herein provided for shall determine, not to exceed $6,500 each. The entire number to be delivered in one year from date of contract. Said mortar and all which may be contracted for under this provision shall be subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture.

If there were fifty such mortars furnished they would cost about $325,000; if one hundred were furnished they would cost about $650,000; but can we expect to get a single mortar under that provision? Is it not a delusion and a snare to those who hope for real preparation for the defense of the country? Who can point to the person who will manufacture the plant to build the mortar and furnish the ammunition and have the gun tested without knowing whether he is going to get a contract or not?

Then the next clause of the same section is a great deal worse. It provides that—

Whenever any party shall present for test a completed single-charge breech-loading steel gun of 10 or 12 inches caliber, with the proper supply of ammunition for the test of the same, such gun shall, in the presence of the party presenting it, be subjected to such tests as the board shall have prescribed; and should such gun be shown to the satisfaction of the board by such tests to fulfill the requirements previously prescribed in respect to accuracy, range, power, endurance, and general efficiency, the gun and ammunition shall be paid for at a fair valuation, including cost of transportation, and contract shall be made, at a price reasonable in the opinion of the board, with the party presenting the best of such guns, for a further supply of similar guns, to be subjected to the usual service test before acceptance, the experimental gun and all guns purchased hereunder to be subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture, as follows, namely: For not less than fifty 10-inch steel guns; and for not less than fifty 12-inch steel guns.

If we take the maximum number of steel guns to be provided under this clause, estimating the cost of a gun at $40,000 (and I understand that $40,000 to $45,000 is about what a gun will cost), there would be $2,000,000 appropriated under that clause. If there is to be the maximum number of 12-inch guns, costing about $55,000 each, there would be $2,750,000 to be applied in that way for the actual cost of the guns, making $4,750,000.

Is there a human being who believes that one gun will ever be obtained under that provision of the bill, and is not the clause an entire delusion? If we desire to have the country put in a condition for defense, if we expect to obtain the making of guns which will meet the necessities of the Government, are we to obtain it with such a provision as this?

It seems to me that if Senators mean anything they had better change the form of this proposed legislation so as to produce results. If they mean anything, if they mean to hold out the idea that they are appropriating about $5,000,000 for preparation for the defense of the country, and know it will not effect it, then in common fairness we ought to strike out these clauses. They have no business in the bill if they are there simply a delusion, if they must be ineffective; and I take it there is no Senator here who will assume that there can be a gun obtained under either of these provisions.

Then, beginning in line 49, the sixth section provides—

That under the provisions of this section of this act the board shall not expend or enter into contract or contracts involving the Government in an aggregate expenditure exceeding $6,000,000 nor an expenditure on the part of the Government in any one fiscal year in excess of $2,000,000.

It seems to me there is no use in putting such provisions in the bill. We can make a provision that will secure the construction of such guns. Surely we are capable of employing language that will carry out the purpose and secure the construction of the guns; and if we mean that, why not put in the bill language that will give us the guns we need, and not language that produces a mere delusion, and that we know in advance will never produce a gun?

I trust if the language is not improved that this section will be omitted. The truth is it seems to me that the bill ought to be recommitted to the committee, and let them reframe the language so that it will be calculated to produce real results.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, in regard to the first paragraph of section 6, the committee had what we regarded as satisfactory assurances that a gun would be produced for test in accordance with it. The ordnance officers, I think, do not believe the gun will respond to the test; they do not think it will be as good as the type gun to which reference is made and which is set up as the standard; but that some responsible manufacturer will present for test within a brief period a mortar which he thinks will stand the required test, I have no doubt. If he should be mistaken, then we shall not get them, of course we shall not want them, but we shall have at least furnished the opportunity to the men who think they can make just as good a gun out of cast-iron as the Government already has from a combination of cast-iron and steel, and they will have been satisfied at least that they are wrong, and we shall know also that they are wrong. If we get them, then we shall have a weapon which, while not the very best perhaps that can be had, at the same time, as I have before stated, will be better than nothing.

In regard to the second paragraph of the sixth section I do not know, nor do I have any very strong assurance, that we shall get by reason of its adoption finished guns from the hands of private manufacturers, but we shall at least have made the effort, and we shall have made it under a proposition which I think is entirely reasonable. If there is any manufacturer in the United States who has the machinery, or who can be induced by a reasonable contract to provide the machinery, we give him the opportunity to do so, and we encourage him to do so. I think it is fair encouragement. It may prove not to be so, but like a good many other things there will be some demonstration which will make us wiser.

Now, suppose we do not get anything. It is not fair to say, it would not be fair for the Senator from Texas to say, even if that were disclosed by the experience under this bill, that it had been a delusion and a snare. I do not think he means to say that the committee has designed to put something in the bill which it knew would be ineffective. I doubt very much if he with all his resources could frame a provision which would be more likely to accomplish the results, unless he lowered the standard or largely increased the number of guns to be purchased under it in such a way as to offer extraordinary inducements to somebody to engage in the manufacture of these guns.

It has been a standing complaint for many years that the Ordnance Bureau of this Government was non-receptive, that it was determined that no guns should be made for which it did not first furnish the type and prescribe what should be done at every stage of the manufacture in such a way that all the guns we have should be credited to them. It is claimed by persons of high and low degree that they do not get consideration for their inventions, for their enterprise, for their genius, for their determination, for their skill at the hands of the Ordnance Bureau. I do not say whether that is true or not; it is not necessary for the purposes of this argument, but I only say that an opinion of that kind exists very largely in this country.

Now, here is an answer to it. We say to these manufacturers, "If you think you can make a better gun or as good a gun as the United States Government can make, here is your opportunity. Show your faith by your works."

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Has the Senator ever heard by word of mouth or by letter from a single steel manufacturer in the country that he has the slightest idea of doing any such thing as he is invited to do here?

Mr. PLUMB. I have not myself individually, but I have been told by members of this body and by at least one member of the House of Representatives that it was altogether probable that the Government would get satisfactory propositions under sections similar to this.

Mr. HAWLEY. No proposition has been made?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; I have been told so.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have seen a large number of the leading steel manufacturers, and have visited their establishments and talked the subject over with them. I never heard one of them say anything like it. It is a very strange thing to me that they are willing to spend a million dollars for a plant to produce a gun to be tested.

Mr. PLUMB. If I were in the place of the Senator from Connecticut and possessing the authority he does, I would not discourage by my language on this floor the manufacturers from engaging in just this kind of work. He certainly admits that it is desirable to do it. Why should he characterize them in advance as being fools if they undertake it?

Mr. HAWLEY. I can not instruct men in their business. I am speaking of what they have told us. Nothing in the world that the Senator or myself or anybody else says here will have any influence upon their investment or non-investment of a million dollars. They know all about the business. I am only telling what they have said. If any one of them has privately said, when none of the others stood by, "If you will pass a section like this, I shall go to work, at an enormous expense of a million or a million and a half, and produce a gun under the chance that I may get a contract," I will confess it is a man I do not know.

Mr. PLUMB. I have been told on what I believe to be perfectly good authority that the largest steel manufacturing concern in the country is now putting up a new plant, expected to be the largest, the most complete and perfect in appointment that there is in the United States, and that it would engage in gun-making under a provision similar to the one we are now discussing. That may be a mistake; I do not know. I do not know that I am aware of a single steel manufacturer in the United States whose establishment is in a condition to verify anything I have heard.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is only one establishment in the United States to which that language will apply. It will soon be ready to make large guns.

Mr. TELLER. What establishment is that?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Bethlehem Works, which has nearly completed a plant for the manufacture of heavy gun forgings. When I expressed my incredulity as to whether anybody had done so, I based it partly on the very latest information I had from that concern, from a man deeply interested in their enterprise. They have made no proposition. They may have, nevertheless, a concealed purpose to be ahead of anybody else in making this costly plant.

Mr. PLUMB. The company to which I refer is not the company about which the Senator is speaking.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know any of their business secrets, but it is an amazing piece of news that anybody will make that calculation upon having a contract with the Government of the United States hereafter.

Mr. PLUMB. I was considerate myself of the Senator, because if I was engaged in manufacturing steel and had half way a notion under an opportunity of this kind, his expressions here would undoubtedly induce an abandonment of the enterprise.

The Senator will bear in mind that sometimes after a man looks over a thing he changes his mind. The Senator was led to believe, as I was led to believe, three or four years ago when we considered this question, not exactly together but at the same time and in connection with the preparation of a bill, that we could not get manufacturers to erect the necessary plant for the production of steel forgings for guns of a caliber of 10 or 12 inches or make a contract for $10,000,000 worth of steel. We now know that a quarter of that sum will produce a result. Manufacturers, conservative and interested as they are, grasping as they are, gain in knowledge by process of time. It sometimes happens, I have no doubt, that if they can not get everything that is lying around loose they will take an analogous proportion of it, and so it may prove that while the manufacturers would not do that at the date of the investigation which the Senator made carefully and thoroughly and which he had in his mind, they may do something a great deal better now.

But I do not speak of this as a certainty. I do not regard this myself as anything but a tentative proposition. I want to open the door just as far as it may be opened safely to the private enterprise of this country to do what we are now prepared to do only through the medium of the Ordnance Bureau, and see how it works. At all events, as I said, we shall have disarmed the kind of criticism of which I have spoken. It will probably excite some manufacturer to say what he would do if he will not do this; and I am not prepared to believe that there will not be found a manufacturer who will be looking to contracts with the Government as a direction in which he can employ his capital profitably, because the manufacturers know that when the Government enters upon an expenditure of this kind it is likely to continue, and a Government contract has some attractions after all to the ordinary human being.

So while I do not say, to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, that we are going positively to get anything out of either one of these provisions, I believe, I feel perfectly sure in fact, that there will be presented for test a mortar; and I am not prepared to believe, if that mortar does answer to the test prescribed, that the law will be disobeyed and that the fifty absolutely required to be purchased will not be purchased.

I am encouraged to believe that under the second provision some manufacturer will present for test a steel gun which he will believe when he presents it (and that belief, of course, would induce him to manufacture it) that it will prove to be as good as, if not better than, the gun which the Government is manufacturing on its own account.

Suppose, however, he does not do that. We have still here two million and a half dollars' worth of steel provided for, which we are to absolutely get without any contingency whatever, and we have a gun factory provided for, which is to finish and assemble these guns. That much of the work we are sure of, anyhow. Two millions and a half dollars' worth of steel forgings, according to the testimony of competent officers in the Ordnance Bureau, will be produced. These gun manufactories would cost probably three-quarters of a million dollars, and the gun would be finished and assembled during two years or perhaps within three years of time.

So I think my friend from Texas, with his very worthy zeal in favor of doing something in the nature of coast defense, will feel on reflection that even if these two provisions which we have been discussing should prove entirely ineffective it will not warrant us in rejecting this bill or delaying its passage for a moment.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not state fully——

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if he does not think that a part of to-morrow may be profitably expended in considering this bill? It is five and a half o'clock.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall not contend for a further consideration of the bill this evening.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope to be allowed to say a single word.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word. I do not wish to speak to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, who desires to submit some remarks now.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I say a word before he goes on? If the bill passes over, as undoubtedly it will, I hope it will be called up immediately after the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, at once.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I stated pretty broadly that I did not think under either clause of section 6, to which I referred, we should get any guns or mortars. I did not state the reason for that, because that reason had been stated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I merely referred to the fact that it would involve an expenditure in plant that we could not expect private parties to engage in without some certainty of recompense for the expenditure in the plant.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] goes upon the idea with his bill that it is more important to encourage private enterprise than to obtain guns. That is my deduction from the line of his remarks. If it was the production of a commercial commodity, something which would have a market and competition for its consumption, that would be all right; I would have no objection to the policy presented by the Senator from Kansas; but if we expect to get guns for the benefit of the Government we must bear in mind that the Government is the only possible customer, and it must incur the expense and responsibility of the necessary plant for the construction of the guns, whether they are made by the Government or by private individuals.

I think from my mode of reasoning that there is no other possible way of securing the construction of guns and mortars. There is no inducement held out here in these two clauses of section 6 for the persons furnishing mortars and guns for test that they will be compensated in any way for the expense they may go to in the private enterprise of developing proper mortars and proper guns.

It seems to me, under such circumstances, that it is not at all probable, as I said before, that one gun will be produced. The Senator from Kansas suggests that mortars may be produced under the first clause of the sixth section. I do not know what a plant would cost. I take it the Senator from Kansas is much better informed than I am; but it will cost a million or a million and a half dollars. I take it we all feel certain that there are no private parties going to invest a million or a million and a half dollars and construct a gun at a very large expenditure, and furnish the ammunition and put it in position for test in order to take the chance of possibly getting a contract to construct a number of guns.

These were the objections I had, and I repeat that my conviction is that every interest in this country requires that it should be in a better condition of defense, that it should have a better navy, that it should strengthen its fortifications, that it should provide more and better guns, and more and better material of every kind for the defense of the country.

The Senator from Kansas thinks that there is no danger that there will ever be a hostile shot fired here. I think it is assuming a very great responsibility for the lawmakers of this country, for those who have charge of the dearest interests of this country, to assume that with all the complications which surround us, with our position in the world, with our position as a nation, being mixed up with all the commercial and political relations of the world, that there will be no hostile shot fired. I trust that may be so. No one would dread more than I would dread to see a war inaugurated. No one would go further than I would, on terms of honor and propriety, to avoid a war. But if we would avoid it, we ought to have that sort of statesmanship, that sort of prescience, that sort of knowledge which would qualify us to prepare for such contingencies and to sustain our negotiations by the proper means of sustentation.

As I had occasion to say once before here, I believe unorganized power, I care not how great it is, is totally inefficient in the presence of organized power. A great Government like ours, charged with the responsibility which it has of protecting the population and the interests which it must protect, owes it to itself, owes it to its people, owes it to every interest, if it would place itself in the position of a first-class power of the earth, to enforce the principles of right, which are necessary to the protection of its people and its honor. It is for that reason that it seems to me the committee ought to make more efficient provision for securing the construction of guns.

FORT WALLACE RESERVATION.

Mr. PLUMB. Before moving an adjournment, I desire to present a conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will be received and read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter stricken out by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Union Pacific Railroad Company is hereby granted the preference right, for the period of three months after the appraisement herein provided for, to purchase the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 24, township 13 south, range 39 west, and fractional blocks 44, 49, 50, 51, 36, and 48, according to the town plat of the city of Wallace, the same being now occupied by said railroad company for depot and other purposes, at $30 per acre."

And the Senate agree to the same.

P. B. PLUMB,
H. M. TELLER,
JAMES H. BERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WM. S. HOLMAN,
J. E. WASHINGTON,
E. J. TURNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. I move the adoption of the report.

The report was concurred in.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CALL, Mr. TURPIE, and Mr. PLUMB submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. PLUMB. Now I move the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before submitting the motion, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 31, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 30, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

JACOB BLOOMSTEIN VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting findings of fact by the court in the case of Jacob Bloomstein vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, August 29, 1888.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, and also as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. I request that the resignation be accepted.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES TRACEY.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from New York will be acceded to, and he will be excused from further service on these committees.

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3234) to abolish circuit-court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILKINS, indefinitely, on account of very important business.

To Mr. LAIDLAW, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BREWER, indefinitely, after Tuesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. BYNUM, for fifteen days, from Saturday, September 1.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of absence for myself for fifteen days.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the leave of absence will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. WISE. I also wish to ask leave of absence from Monday next for sixteen days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN TESTIMONY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD], the chairman of the select committee on the alleged violation of the law as to the importation of contract labor, etc., asks that an order be made to print the testimony so far as taken by that committee. The Chair will state that the request of the gentleman does not specify the number of copies to be printed.

Mr. FORD. The request is to print the usual number of copies; 1,900, I believe.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. To be distributed amongst the members?

The SPEAKER. They will be printed of course for the use of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that when an order is made to print in this manner the number printed do not go to members by the usual method of distribution.

The SPEAKER. They do not of course go to members as other documents which are printed for the use of the members; but they go into the document-room, where they are accessible to the members.

Mr. BRUMM. I think in a case of this importance there ought to be some understanding that the members shall each have the right to go there and secure a copy.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is a very pertinent suggestion. It not infrequently happens that members go to the document-room to secure copies of documents and find them exhausted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the reason I suggested to the gentleman from Ohio that when the order is made to print the usual number of copies they are not distributed pro rata amongst the members. If it is designed that they shall go to the members it is necessary to introduce the resolution in another form; and I would suggest in this case that it had better go to the Committee on Printing, if that is the purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the resolution is referred to the Committee on Printing it can report the cost of printing an extra number for distribution amongst the members.

If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Michigan will be acceded to and the usual number printed in this case.

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If this should be referred to the Committee on Printing, would they have the right to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. They have that right under the rule.

Mr. FORD. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, as to whether or not, in order to print more than the usual number allowed by the rule, it will not be necessary to introduce a concurrent resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is if the cost exceeds $500. But the Committee on Printing can ascertain and report that fact.

Mr. FORD. My only object was, that after the matter was set up and the plates were stereotyped we could then determine how many extra copies were needed. This order as made will cover 1,900 copies, and then a concurrent resolution can be introduced if extra copies are desired.

Mr. SPRINGER. The custom is to print the usual number as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan first, and then introduce a resolution to print extra copies.

The SPEAKER. This resolution, the Chair understands, is not objected to; but it would be necessary to introduce a resolution and refer the matter to the Committee on Printing if that course is desired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Michigan will give me his attention for a moment, I will state that it is not customary to send a request of this character to the Committee on Printing when the usual number of copies is simply desired. They are printed in the natural order under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has not been sent to the Committee on Printing. It has been agreed to by the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That only calls for the usual number of copies.

The SPEAKER. It does; and a resolution to print an extra number would necessarily go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Before this matter is disposed of, I wish to call attention to the fact that in the distribution of such documents it is our experience that after the usual number is printed and sent to the document-room it is impossible to get a copy.

A MEMBER. There is no way to prevent that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, yes there is, if it is provided that at least one copy shall be reserved for each member.

Mr. BRUMM. That ought to be done.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not perfectly competent for the House to direct the superintendent of the document-room to apportion those that are ordered to be printed among the members?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the rule of the House and the statute prescribe what distribution shall be made of the usual number of copies. The House can not change that except by changing the law.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the superintendent of the document-room be directed to apportion among the members pro rata the document just ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is fair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. According to the rule, some of these have to go to the Senate document-room as well as to the House document-room.

Mr. FORD. What are you going to do with the 600 copies of the regular order?

Mr. SPRINGER. Under the rules of the House, as members well know, they can have a copy sent to them by ordering it from the Public Printer. The rules formerly required that the Public Printer should send one copy of these documents to each of the members. We changed that, because we found that a great number of these documents accumulated in our rooms, and now there are only eleven copies of them left in the folding-room. If we want extra copies they can be obtained under a resolution which can be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] what are the difficulties about apportioning the number assigned to the House among the members of the House?

Mr. SPRINGER. It changes existing law.

Mr. BLOUNT. But it does not change existing law. Why is it not perfectly competent to direct the officer in charge of these documents, or the superintendent of the folding-room, to dispose of the number assigned to the House by distributing them among the members pro rata?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is just and proper.

Mr. SPRINGER. That only leaves eleven copies in the folding-room.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that that be done in this case alone.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That the number which is assigned to the House document-room shall be divided among the members?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; pro rata.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I see no objection to that; but I should take it, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the importance which seems to attach to this publication it will be followed by a concurrent resolution to print extra copies beyond the regular number.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am informed by the chairman of the committee [Mr. FORD] that that will be done, and a resolution will be introduced for that purpose. It will be reported back immediately. The plates will be made for the usual number, and when that resolution is passed the Public Printer will have the stereotype plates ready, and then they can be printed off immediately.

Mr. BLOUNT. Still I think there would be no harm in the first publication going to the members.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state the objection to my friend. The number that goes to the document-room is intended to be for the permanent supply for this House. Some years hence, say ten years from now, a debate may spring up upon this question, and members might want to obtain this publication from the document-room.

Mr. FORD. But there are 100 copies which go to the Clerk for that purpose. The 600 copies that go to the document-room are for distribution to members of this House.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is all I ask.

Mr. SPRINGER. One copy to each member?

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I modify my request so that there may be one copy sent to each member of the House by the Public Printer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was accordingly adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5516) for the relief of John H. Weeks; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 201) to correct an error in the act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the order calling committees may be dispensed with to-day, and that members having reports to submit may file them with the Clerk of the House.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Regular order.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. YOST. Mr. Speaker, I rise to correct the RECORD. On page 8790 of the RECORD of Tuesday last there is a matter which I desire to correct. It would be proper to state that I would have made this correction earlier, but my colleague from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was not in his seat on Tuesday last, and I did not see him in his seat yesterday until after the House had gone into the Committee of the Whole. I desired that he should be present when I made the correction.

After the second line he states "there were only sixteen Democrats and fifteen Republicans against it." I interjected there "twelve Republicans against it and twenty-three for it;" but the Reporter did not catch the remark owing to the great confusion in the House. I desire that it should go in there now.

Mr. WISE. If you stated "twelve" as the number of the Republicans, and I said "fifteen," you are correct. I did not mean to make a misstatement. I gave the names, which show there were "twelve."

Mr. YOST. I said there were twelve Republicans against it and twenty-three for it.

Mr. WISE. That is correct.

Mr. YOST. One thing further. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk the RECORD of Tuesday, and have him read the paragraph I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WISE. Now, Mr. Chairman, in all honor and fairness, do you not think it is audacity to have the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST] come here, hard pressed in his canvass, and, in order that he may have ammunition, with this record staring him in the face, endeavor to make a party question of the Blair bill? I do profess that I would not be guilty of a lie; and I believe the man who practices a fraud is guilty of a lie. I would not be guilty of a lie for my seat here. I would not hold it, if I were capable of perpetrating a lie. I want to make no false impression. I do not want it to go forth to my people that all Democrats are in favor of the Blair bill. I know they are not; neither are the Republicans. This is not a party question.

The man who attempts to make it a party question is either in a state of ignorance or worse. He is willing to sacrifice the cause for a political, party purpose. I was once prosecutor in my district, and of all crimes in the catalogue I hated that of false pretense worse than any other. To the bold, brave highwayman, who would come and demand your purse, you might give some portion of your admiration for his courage. But the small man and the sneak-thief who filches money by false pretenses excites your disgust. Mr. Chairman, I like the bold, brave, manly——

A MEMBER. Highwayman.

Mr. WISE. Statesman, who honestly follows his principles anywhere and everywhere, and who would scorn to profit by a false impression. I thank the House kindly for its attention.

Mr. YOST. I desire to ask my colleague whether the remarks which have just been read were intended to reflect upon me personally, or whether they were used in a general sense.

Mr. BLAND. I make the point that no question of privilege is presented to the House.

Mr. WISE. I did not intend to reflect personally upon my colleague.

Mr. YOST. That is all I desired to ask.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] makes the point that no question of privilege is presented to the House.

Mr. PAYSON. The matter is all settled between the gentlemen.

RELIEF FROM CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent that there be a reprint of the bill (H. R. 6106) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers of the late war. The edition already printed has been exhausted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore.. There being no objection, the order will be made.

MRS. GENERAL WARD B. BURNETT.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of two bills which, by previous order of the House, were postponed until to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. STRUBLE. In regard to the first of those bills—the bill (S. 681) to increase the pension of Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett—it was especially agreed that its consideration should not interfere with the bill now pending for the organization of Oklahoma. I had sincerely hoped that this pension bill might be disposed of this morning, but in view of the fact that it conflicts with the bill already pending, I ask, as a further favor at the hands of the House, that Senate bill No. 681 may be allowed to be called up for consideration during the session of Thursday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill (S. 681) to increase the pension of Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett be postponed for one week.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move, then, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until one week from to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

MARGARET STAFFORD WORTH.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that a similar order of postponement be made with reference to the other bill fixed for consideration this morning—the bill (S. 867) granting a pension to Margaret Stafford Worth.

Mr. CHEADLE. I hope that the same order may be made with reference to this bill as was made just now in the other case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] asks that the same order be made with reference to this bill as was adopted in regard to the one just acted upon by the House. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INTERNAL REVENUE DISTRICT OF FLORIDA.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11308) to subdivide the internal revenue collection district of Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry; has the morning hour for the presentation of reports been dispensed with?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not been. Objection was made to that request. The regular order is now the call of committees for reports.

HENRY A. RAMSAY.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11197) for the removal of the political disabilities of Henry A. Ramsay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WRITS OF ERROR IN CAPITAL CASES.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute the bill (S. 3234) to abolish circuit court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DEED TO SAMUEL I. GUSTIN.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10919) to make valid a deed to a certain tract of land in Bibb County, Georgia, made and delivered by Brig. Gen. Davis Tilson, acting assistant commissioner of the Freedman's Bureau, to Samuel I. Gustin, his heirs and assigns; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGES ACROSS KENTUCKY RIVER.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11262) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine and Beattyville Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MATILDA SPANGLER.

Mr. YODER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10106) to place the name of Matilda Spangler on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour for the consideration of bills commences at twenty-five minutes to 1 o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to dispense with that hour for to-day.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

OKLAHOMA.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Oklahoma bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

The Clerk will read the pending amendment, which was moved by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "acre," in line 14 of section 5, the following:

"Provided, That all honorably discharged Union soldiers, sailors, and marines, who served in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, shall, in making entries for actual settlement under the provisions of this act, be, and hereby are, exempted, in consideration of said service, from the payment of the purchase price provided for in this act; and proof of such actual service for a period of at least sixty days, and of honorable discharge therefrom, by such former soldier, sailor, or marine, shall be accepted by the United States in payment in full of the purchase price of the lands so entered upon, and all fees in connection with said entry. And all land officers of the United States are directed to give preference to the persons making entries under this provision."

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose the point of no quorum was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON]. The vote will be again taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 51.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 92.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following proviso to the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That no person shall be authorized to enter land under any provision of this act who at the time of applying to make such entry is the owner of 160 acres of land or more in any State or Territory, or who shall have sold 160 acres of land or more within ninety days before applying to make such entry. The Secretary shall prescribe rules to carry into effect this provision. No land warrant or scrip of any kind shall be located on any land embraced in this act.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to strike out "160 acres," wherever it occurs, and insert "80 acres."

Mr. PAYSON'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I move to strike out that part of the amendment relating to any sale within three months.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the portion proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Or who shall have sold 80 acres of land or more within ninety days before applying to make such entry.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WEAVER. I wish to make a remark and offer an amendment. It ought to be a voluntary sale.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what it means.

Mr. WARNER. It can not mean anything else.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Is it in order to move an amendment making it one year instead of ninety days?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to that.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If it is to have any effect it should be made one year.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WEAVER. Oh, no; that is going to an extreme.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask only to speak one minute on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. OUTHWAITE I will not object if I am allowed a minute to reply.

Mr. PERKINS. Has debate been limited?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Ohio one minute?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I want one minute to reply.

Mr. WEAVER. That is all right; there is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of reserving every acre of that land to poor people, there are hundreds of thousands of poor men in the Northwest and all over the country who are mortgaged beyond their ability to redeem their homes, and it does look to me a hardship to say such a man can not sell his mortgaged farm and save to himself two or three hundred dollars out of the wreck, and can not be permitted to go down there and locate a home for himself and family. It does not look right and it is not right. It excludes many worthy men whose misfortune it is to be mortgaged beyond their power of redemption. I make a plea for these men and do not want this in the bill because I think it is not fair.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the settlers to whom the gentleman refers who had their lands mortgaged were alone to go there I apprehend the objection would be good. But I assume that that is not the case. It is not likely. It is to prevent those already having excellent homes of 80 acres, who are well established in life, from breaking up and selling out their lands and coming down into this Territory and taking up the choice lands from those who have not 80 acres or 40 acres or 10 acres or any acres at all. The purpose of the bill is to provide lands for the landless.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And homes for the homeless.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes.

Mr. WEAVER. The man who is the most homeless on earth is the man who has a mortgage beyond his ability to redeem.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. And I think, in order to allow those who have not homes to secure them in preference to those who are already well established, the amendment ought to be adopted, and that we ought not to legislate for the benefit of those who have already 80 acres of land as against those who have none.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. OUTHWAITE, the House divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 63.

Mr. HOOKER. No quorum.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would rather withdraw the amendment, if I may be permitted to do so, than take up the time of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to withdraw it.

The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. PERKINS. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Indiana will strike out the words "or who shall have sold 80 acres of land or more within ninety days before filing the homestead entry" there will be no objection whatever to the amendment, I think.

Mr. RYAN. That has already been voted down, anyhow.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not consent to do that. The whole scope of the bill as it stands applies to a few persons——

Mr. SPRINGER. I am very sorry the gentleman from Indiana did not discover these good amendments and apply them to the general land laws when he brought in a bill this session revising the whole system.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are in that law substantially.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think not; and I would like very much for the gentleman to show me where they are in the law.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to have the amendment read again with a view of suggesting an amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. PERKINS. After the words "eighty acres," where they first appear in the amendment, I would suggest the addition of the words "free of incumbrance." I think, with the gentleman from Iowa, that there is serious objection to that feature——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, the committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 59.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his amendment now, I will yield to him to move it in the House and have the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that there may be a yea-and-nay vote on it in the House, I shall consent.

Mr. PAYSON. Well, that ought to include the further proposition that the amendment may be divided.

Mr. RYAN. Yes.

Mr. PAYSON. Because the first part will meet the universal concurrence of the House, in my judgment, and I had prepared an amendment substantially the same in character.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is subject to division.

Mr. PAYSON. If the understanding is that the amendment as it stands shall be voted down, so that it may be brought before the House in a proper form and be then voted on, there will be no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will permit me, the proposition is divisible into three parts, and any member can demand a division of it. With the understanding that I shall have a yea-and-nay vote in the House upon the amendment I consent to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then announce the result of the vote. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it is understood that this matter may be offered in the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I agree to that.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to offer a further amendment to section 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out in lines 15 and 16 the words "have resided in the United States for two years, and;" so that it will read:

"All persons who are heads of families, or over twenty-one years of age, and who are citizens of the United States, or have declared their intention to become citizens thereof," etc.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment believing it to be in the general line of past legislation upon the subject of public lands. The policy of Federal legislation has hitherto been to give the adopted citizen and him who has declared his intention to become a citizen the same rights to acquire and hold property as the citizen by birth. I believe this policy to have been wise and beneficent. Under it our greatest development has taken place. With our present rate of immigration it should not be discontinued. Whatever may be said as to the foreign-born citizens of our large cities no complaint has ever been heard in regard to those settled in country homes. On the contrary, they have always been recognized as industrious, thrifty, and valuable citizens.

The immigrant's ambition is, as a rule, to secure himself and family a home, and his content and happiness depend largely on the fulfillment of that wish, while discontent arises as the acquisition of homes is made difficult. If it were not that these additions to our population are enabled to secure themselves homes among us, and thus give hope of becoming profitable to themselves and the community, it were far better not to admit them at all. In that case not many years would elapse until you would hear the same objections raised to European immigration that is now made to the Chinese.

If any danger to the maintenance of our institutions lies in store for us, I verily believe that land monopoly and consequent difficulty in securing independent homes for the hundreds of millions who will, before another century has rolled by, inhabit our country, are most likely to prove the rock upon which our noble ship may be wrecked. Popular government must have its roots deep in the hearts and affections of the masses, and all legislation should have in view the welfare of the masses, the perfect equality of every voter, and absolute submission to the will of the majority legally expressed.

The surest way to secure the loyalty of our adopted citizens is to attach them to the soil. Our foreign-born citizens in country homes have at all times proved themselves peaceful, law-abiding, and patriotic, and loyal to our institutions and laws.

In this bill you say to the immigrant: You may immediately upon your arrival, provided you will only declare your intention to become a citizen of the United States, enter lands anywhere within the public domain, and thus lay the foundation for a happy, prosperous home for yourself and family, but if you wend your way to rich Oklahoma you must remain a hewer of wood and drawer of water for a period of two years.

If this is the right policy as to this Territory, why should it not be equally applied to all public lands?

Take the immigration of the last two years as a basis and apply this policy generally to our public lands, and you add to our wage-working population a million people, nearly half of whom are males between the ages of fifteen and forty years, the very time of life when every inducement should be extended to them to secure independent homes.

Our total immigration for the year ending June 30, 1887, was 490,109, and of these 227,284 were males between fifteen and forty years. During the year ending June 30, 1888, the total number of immigrants exceeded that of the previous year by about 50,000.

With the labor question fast pressing upon us is it not the wise thing to keep open this safety-valve, and not by the very force of this proposed legislation make the acquisition of homes more difficult? If you carry this proposition to its legitimate results you will, as I have said, with our present rate of immigration, add to the already crowding, jostling ranks of wage-workers a million people. The tendency of this must necessarily be to make the relations between the employé and employer still more strained, and to increase the present difficulties and jealousies between labor and capital.

Do not understand me as favoring alien ownership of lands. I do not. I believe no immigrant not fit for citizenship should be permitted to enter our ports. Those who have entered under proper restrictions, and who have declared their intention to become citizens, should stand the equal of every other citizen before the law as to property rights and the pursuit of happiness. Having adopted this country as their own they are as much concerned in its welfare and prosperity and the country is as much concerned in them as if their forefathers had landed on Plymouth rock from the Mayflower. I regret that the committee has seen proper to extend to these future citizens of our common country this stepmotherly greeting, which is likely to sow in their breasts the seeds of disappointment and dissatisfaction from their very arrival amongst us. I believe the proposition to be contrary to the liberal spirit which has formerly prevailed on this subject, and to be a sharp entering wedge to the recognition of distinction between different classes of our citizens. I bespeak for my amendment favorable consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Section 6 of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. That whenever the Cherokee tribe of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section, in legal manner, to the commission provided for in this act, and the President has issued his proclamation fixing the time as herein provided, the unoccupied portion of the lands west of the ninety-sixth degree of west longitude, ceded to the United States by the said tribe of Indians by the treaty concluded July 19, 1866, shall be open to settlement, except the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of said land, which shall be reserved for school purposes, and shall be disposed of to actual settlers only, in quantities not to exceed 160 acres, in square form, to each settler, at the price of $1.25 per acre. All persons who are heads of families or over twenty-one years of age, and who are citizens of the United States, or have resided in the United States two years and have declared their intention to become citizens thereof, shall be entitled to become actual settlers on such lands. An accurate account shall be kept by the Secretary of the Interior of the money received as proceeds of the sale of said lands, and said money shall be placed to the credit of the Cherokee Indian tribe in the Treasury of the United States, after deducting the cost of the sale by the United States and the amount heretofore appropriated and paid to the Cherokee tribe as part compensation for said unoccupied lands: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any person to enter upon or occupy any of the lands mentioned in this or the preceding section, for the purpose of settlement or otherwise, until after the said Indian tribes and the commissioners herein authorized have concluded an agreement to that effect as provided herein, and laid the same before the President of the United States, who is thereupon authorized and required to issue his proclamation declaring such relinquished lands open to settlement, and fixing the time from and after which such lands may be taken. Any person who may enter upon any part of said lands contrary to the provisions of this act, and prior to the time fixed by the President's proclamation, shall not be permitted to make entry upon any lands or lay any claim thereto in said Territory.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to offer the same amendment to this section—to strike out, in lines 16 and 17, the words:

Have resided in the United States two years, and.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was agreed to before in the other section, and I hope there will be no objection to it now.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BARNES. I desire especially to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the language of the sixth section clearly misrepresents the history of the case. It reads:

That whenever the Cherokee tribe of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section in legal manner to the commission provided for in this act and the President has issued his proclamation fixing the time as herein provided, the unoccupied portions of the land west of the ninety-sixth degree of west longitude, ceded to the United States by the said tribe of Indians by the treaty concluded July 19, 1866, shall be open to settlement, etc.

By reference to the treaty it will be seen that there never has been any actual cession of these lands.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to an amendment, "agreed to be ceded to the United States."

Mr. BARNES. It was not agreed to be ceded to the United States. It was agreed to be ceded to the Indians settling thereon. I move to amend by striking out the words "ceded to the United States," in lines 6 and 7, and make it read, "agreed to be ceded as provided by the treaty of July 19, 1866."

Mr. RYAN. Let it be read as amended, so we may see how it will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "ceded to the United States" and insert "as agreed to be ceded according to the provisions of the treaty concluded July 19, 1866."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOKER. Before going from that section I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "in legal manner to the commission provided for in this act" and insert "until the consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians shall be first obtained by a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, and when said commission shall have reported that said consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians has been obtained."

Mr. SPRINGER. The eleventh section provides for a commission, and this simply anticipates it. Let your amendment be offered to that section.

Mr. HOOKER. No; I want it to go right in there.

If it be true that under the provisions of this bill you are going to get as a condition-precedent their consent, then it ought to be done and reported before any organization of the Territory is attempted to be established there, and that is the reason why I offer this amendment. It will be observed that the language used in the bill of the committee is exceedingly vague and indefinite in its character. It says "that whenever the Cherokee tribe of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section in legal manner," without stating what that manner is to be, or in what way that assent is to be obtained. The provision should be made to appoint a commission to visit these tribes in the first instance and obtain their consent to the institution of a Territorial government there before anything is attempted to be done. It should be a condition-precedent before establishing the Territorial government there, and especially before the Government appoints the officers of the government and all the paraphernalia of a Territorial government and then obtain the concession of the Indians.

If the parties who are in favor of this bill are in earnest about requiring the consent of the Indian tribes, and especially of this tribe, for they are the owners, as I have shown on a former occasion, and have patents to the land embraced in this proposed Territory, it ought to be had as a condition-precedent. To create a government there, without any expression of opinion had before from the tribes and the fact that the consent should be obtained afterwards, would, in my judgment, be an expensive operation. I do not know how much it will take, Mr. Chairman, to carry into effect this Oklahoma bill. I venture the assertion that it will not cost the Government less than ten or fifteen million dollars to establish this Territory. If you are in earnest about obtaining the consent of the Indians, all this expense of the appointment of officers, and instituting all the paraphernalia of instituting a Territorial government can be avoided, because it will all be nugatory and worthless unless the consent of the Indians be obtained. Is it not, therefore, wisdom on the part of the United States if a Territorial government is to be established there to send a commission first; and is it not best that this consent should be obtained as a condition-precedent, before the Territorial government is established? The tribes have never asked for it, and none of them have asked for its establishment there. I submit, therefore, that there ought to be added to this section a provision to indicate that the President of the United States ought to appoint a commission, and that the consent of these people should be had before the establishment of this government. It has been said that this bill was not designed or intended to go into effect until the consent had been obtained of all the Indians in it.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. HOOKER. If that is true, that it shall not operate except upon the consent of all these tribes, ought not that consent to be had before the Territorial government is established, so that it may be ascertained what the restriction by the consent of the Indians will amount to? I will ask, simply as a business proposition, would it not be wise and prudent to obtain the consent of these Indians in the first instance, because unless it is obtained your government would amount to nothing, and you would have had all the expense of establishing a Territorial government over these Indians, and yet no Territorial government established at all? Therefore I hold that the consent of the Indians should be had before any action is taken at all; that is, a provision ought to be adopted in every section of this bill that the assent of the Indians ought to be obtained in the first place.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. If the gentleman from Mississippi will allow me in this connection, I desire to suggest an amendment to come in at the end of line 1 of section 6. It is one which is pertinent to this subject and proper to be considered in connection with the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. I propose to insert after the word "Indians," in line 1 of section 6, the words "and any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein," so that it will read, "that whenever the Cherokee tribe of Indians and any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein shall signify their assent," etc. Now, it is a fact, as my friend the chairman of the committee well understands, that the other civilized tribes have, or claim to have, some interest in these lands.

Mr. WARNER. Can the gentleman tell us what Indians among the civilized tribes claim to have any interest in the Cherokee Outlet?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. All the tribes.

Mr. WARNER. But upon what is that claim founded?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It is asserted and claimed by the representatives of the Indians. If they have no such right or interest, then of course the commission will so determine.

Mr. WARNER. There is an assertion of that kind, but I ask the gentleman from New York, as a lawyer, is there any law or any treaty upon which such a claim can be properly founded?

Mr. HOOKER. If there is none, then the gentleman's amendment will not hurt.

Mr. WARNER. But it will do no good and it is unnecessary.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It is distinctly asserted before the Committee on Indian Affairs and before this House that the other civilized tribes have an interest.

Mr. SYMES. I will ask the gentleman this question: Did it appear in any way before the Committee on Territories that any Indians on this continent had any interest whatever in these lands except the Cherokee tribes?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. There was a memorial presented in behalf of all the civilized tribes protesting against this bill, and they all claimed an interest.

Mr. SYMES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. We had plenty of testimony before us showing the rights of the Cherokees, but nothing whatever showing that any other tribe or tribes of Indians had or claimed to have any interest in these lands.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. My friend will undoubtedly concede that if there are any vested interests in any other tribe or tribes of Indians, they ought in justice to be protected.

Mr. SYMES. But there are no such rights, and I do not think it comports with the dignity of the American Congress, passing an important bill of this character, to be talking here about a claim which has never been presented even among all the wild claims that were urged before the Committee on Territories.

Mr. WEAVER. And by talking about it and putting it in this bill to create such a claim.

Mr. SYMES. Yes, to create such a claim in the visionary minds of sentimentalists.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Conceding that the gentleman is correct, it is only fair that this commission should be vested with power to pass upon the claim of any other tribe or tribes.

Mr. SYMES. That is to say, the gentleman wants to send out a roving commission to look up Indian tribes and Indian agents and Indian attorneys, and see whether or not in the corruption of their imaginative brains they will not present some kind of a claim which has no foundation in fact. Such a course would make a farce of the commission and destroy the decent progress of this proceeding.

Mr. WEAVER. And in case those Indians should make such a claim, you have to get their consent before this law can go into operation.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Oh, no.

Mr. WEAVER. That is the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. RYAN. I want to say to my friend from New York that I do not think he is warranted in making the statement to this House that any tribe of Indians on the face of the earth claims any interest in the Cherokee Outlet except the Cherokees themselves.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Perhaps I am not. Still, it is a fact that the assertion is made.

Mr. RYAN. I do not think the gentleman has any paper, any memorial, or any sort of petition, on the part of any other Indians on the face of the earth, asserting that they have any sort of a claim on this Cherokee Outlet. So that my friend's amendment is simply and entirely without color or shadow of foundation.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I differ with my friend on that point.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. WEAVER. Suppose that Sitting Bull should claim that under this treaty he had a right to petition the United States to be settled on this land as a "friendly Indian," and that therefore his consent was necessary?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Well, if Sitting Bull should make such a claim, the wise commission which will be appointed by the wise Executive of the United States would examine the claim, and if he could establish any rights, of course they ought to be determined and extinguished.

Mr. SYMES. And the gentleman from New York proposes to send out a commission——

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I do not propose it; the bill proposes it.

Mr. SYMES. The gentleman proposes to send out a commission appointed by this wise Executive, and have these wise members of this wise commission sitting there by the month, and have Indians come from all over this country to say whether or not they still claim all this continent. I have myself heard ministers of the gospel practically contend before the Territorial Committee that all the land west of the Missouri River belongs to-day honestly to the Indians, and that is about the kind of farce that you would get up by your amendment.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I did not suppose that in offering this amendment it would excite so much opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] be allowed five minutes more, as nearly all his time has been taken up by others.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I say, Mr. Chairman, I did not suppose that an innocent little amendment like this would excite such violent opposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that this is not offered as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. BAKER, of New York. No; but to be considered in connection with it. I really thought that the chairman of the Committee on Territories and the committee would consent to this amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Indians," line 1, section 6, insert "and any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein."

Mr. SPRINGER. That amendment does not have any relation whatever to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER. No; and it would probably come in better as a separate and independent amendment. I will give way to the gentleman from New York to offer it as a separate amendment, because it comes in at a line of the bill preceding the point where my amendment comes in. Upon this amendment I desire to say a word. It has been said by gentlemen here that there are no other tribes of Indians than the Cherokees who have any interest in the creation of this Territory, which includes the Cherokee Outlet. Surely gentlemen can not have forgotten that every one of the treaties with the five semi-civilized tribes contains a provision that no Territorial or State government shall be established contiguous to any one of those five tribes without their consent. Every treaty contains that provision; yet gentlemen have gravely said here that there is no other tribe of Indians who have any interest in the matter. Why, sir, they every one of them have an interest in it, and they have an interest which they ought to assert and which ought to be recognized in this bill for a simple and obvious reason. When we take the history of this proceeding with regard to constituting this Territory of Oklahoma, we find that a bill was introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress which was a bolder measure than this, because it declared upon its face, what is no doubt behind this bill, namely, a purpose to include the five semi-civilized tribes themselves and the lands which they occupy.

This bill does not propose that, but it does propose to include all the territory in the Indian Territory contiguous to the lands of those tribes, and therefore the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] is a very wise and proper one. And the other Indians are interested. They are interested to this extent, that if you establish, as you propose to do by this bill, a Territorial government bordering upon their lands, you at once create a Territory which will be peopled by white men, a Territory from which you propose to exclude people who desire to occupy that portion of the public domain under the homestead law, and you will have a Territory infringing upon the five semi-civilized tribes which will be peopled by white men, and the next thing will be that you will want to embrace the lands which are now owned and occupied, and defined by metes and bounds, and governed by the respective governments of the five semi-civilized tribes. The bill of last season shows that the purpose is to eventually embrace them all within such Territorial organization as will enable the white people to occupy their lands.

I say, therefore, that every one of the five semi-civilized tribes has an interest in the prevention of the violation of the treaties by which the Government of the United States has most solemnly agreed that at no future time—the language of the treaty is very broad—that at no future time will it organize and create Territories or States contiguous to these Indian lands. No, sir, this Indian Territory itself occupies but a very small area of land, and this bill proposes to take a very large proportion of it near each one of these semi-civilized tribes and organize it into a Territory. The proposition, as was well said by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], is a most anomalous piece of legislation, such as never before has been presented before the Congress of the United States from the organization of the Government down to the present time.

There never has been a proposition to create a Territory like this. I say, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from New York is proper and right, because this measure does affect the interests of every one of these semi-civilized tribes, and virtually interferes with the provisions of the treaty entered into for their protection.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has finally stated the proposition which I imagine my friend from New York was trying to eliminate by his visionary amendment. It is that the five civilized tribes are interested in the organization of Oklahoma Territory, because certain ancient treaties provide that you shall not organize Territories or States contiguous to the five civilized tribes without their consent. If that be the proper construction of those treaties, they were violated by the organization of the Territory and State of Kansas, by the organization of the Territory and State of Colorado, by the organization of the Territory of New Mexico, and I might say by the organization of the State of Texas.

Mr. SPRINGER. And Arkansas.

Mr. SYMES. Yes, and Arkansas, and, comparatively speaking, every other State west of the Missouri River.

Now, we have finally, by the clearly-stated oratorical logic of the gentleman from Mississippi, found out the visionary claim which my friend from New York was trying to get at. I think the House understands it and will vote intelligently upon the question whether we shall send a commission west to negotiate with the Indians in reference to the organization of a Territory or a State of this Union which may be contiguous to or in the vicinity of the five civilized tribes.

Mr. HOOKER. Out of lands belonging to the Indians themselves. Let the gentleman add that and his statement will be complete.

Mr. SYMES. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the question of cession is provided for in other parts of the bill.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose by this amendment to recognize that there is any existing right, title, or claim in any other Indian tribe. But the commission, when appointed, must necessarily act somewhat in a judicial capacity; they must pass upon the title and claim of any tribe or tribes to any portion of these lands. If it appears that no such claim is well founded, the commission will so report, and that report will naturally be conclusive upon the question. But the rights of the Indians under the treaty, as has been well stated by the gentleman from Mississippi, are to be considered. If they have any rights under these treaties, any court in the land would recognize them; and certainly the highest legislative power of the Government will not refuse to recognize the just claim of any tribe or of any man. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted; but if there be no objection the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. SYMES. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES], who is a member of the Committee on Territories, may speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, the construction which is put upon the treaties by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] is entirely erroneous. The five tribes were located on what is now known as the Indian Territory, and the whole of that Territory was granted to them, in pursuance of a policy of the Government adopted in 1830, by which they were to be located on a certain area of territory in compact form, free from the intrusion of the white man. And one of the provisions of those treaties was that no State or Territorial government should ever be created over them. That provision was in each treaty. But the homes were located as homes for all the Indians. It was not intended at that time that there should not be any State or Territory organized outside and independent of that area, because such States or Territories were even then in existence. The intention, in pursuance of that policy, was that this area of territory on which these five tribes were to be located should be a separate Indian home over which no State or Territorial government should be established. And, Mr. Chairman, if this was to be such a home, over which no State or Territorial government was to be created, each tribe located thereon, with its boundaries confined to a certain limit, had an interest in the integrity of the entire Territory. And they have that interest to-day, except so far as modified by the treaty of 1866. It is for this clear reason that each tribe has an interest to-day in the preservation of the integrity of this whole area of country. On this ground, and on this ground especially, I insist that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. SYMES. The gentleman says that the provisions of the treaties to which he has referred maintain his position, except so far as they were modified by the treaty of 1866. Now, did not the treaty of 1866 modify the position that these tribes before occupied with reference to the control over the whole Indian Territory?

Mr. BARNES. Those treaties did not modify the previous position of those tribes one jot or one tittle beyond the point that other tribes of friendly Indians were to be located there. The original policy of preserving that Territory free from the intrusion of the white man was firmly adhered to and carried out in the treaty of 1866; and Mr. Cox, Secretary of the Interior under General Grant, in a report on this subject in 1870, insisted that this policy should be firmly adhered to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the committee will allow me one minute in reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, this section relates simply to ceding the ownership or whatever claim the Indians may have to this land; it has no relation to Territorial governments or anything of that kind.

Now, will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] give me his attention? When this treaty of July 19, 1866, was made between the Cherokee Nation and the United States, a treaty which stipulated that the Government might take these lands at a stipulated price and settle friendly Indians upon them, was the consent of the other tribes asked to that treaty? Was their consent necessary? Of course not; everybody understands that.

So this bill follows the precedent of that treaty, in which the Cherokees alone were parties, and no other Indians were asked to consent; they can dispose of any portion of land which belongs to them only, and not to any other tribe. That is all there is of this.

Mr. BARNES. The gentleman is mistaken, because by the treaty of 1866 the policy of settling other friendly Indians there was preserved.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Cherokees were alone consulted in regard to disposing of their lands.

Mr. BARNES. The policy under which all the tribes had an interest was preserved.

Mr. WEAVER. Does the gentleman insist we should get the consent of every Indian tribe?

Mr. BARNES. I insist we should have the consent of the five tribes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted, and the question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER].

The amendment was again read.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 44.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of no quorum. It is difficult to get a quorum of the House, and time is only wasted.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The amendment is an important one, and I must insist upon a quorum voting upon it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am perfectly willing to give the gentleman a yea-and-nay vote on his amendment in the House.

Mr. HOOKER. If the gentleman withdraws the point of no quorum, I will renew it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have never asked a favor of the House, and during the fourteen years I have been a member I have never been absent from the deliberations of the House except on one occasion for two weeks, except when absent on committees under the order of the House. I wish to be absent for a few days, but can not do so until this bill has been disposed of or is out of the way. It would accommodate me if a vote could be taken upon the amendments and the bill disposed of. It would be a great accommodation to me if that could be done, and I know the public interest will be subserved by the disposal of this bill at an early date.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I can not resist the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois, although the amendment I have submitted is an important one.

Mr. SPRINGER. As I have said, I shall agree the gentleman shall have a yea-and-nay vote on his amendment in the House.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. HOOKER. I renew it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] desires to make a report on the fisheries matter, and for that purpose I ask the committee informally rise and go into the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to submit a conference report, and I do not agree to the committee informally rising merely for the purpose of receiving a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection having been made, the question will be put on the motion of the gentleman that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLAND having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had according to order had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FISHERIES.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. 11257) to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act to protect and defend the rights of American fishermen, approved March 3, 1887, with a substitute therefor. I ask that the original bill be laid upon the table and the substitute be treated as a new bill, and read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I now give notice to the House that under the privilege granted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I will call up this bill for consideration on Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the consideration of the bill continue for longer than one day?

Mr. MCCREARY. It is impossible for me to say, but I believe it will consume more than one day in its consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the members who are absent from the city will feel enough of interest in this important question to be present on that occasion and help to dispose of it as soon as possible.

Mr. HEARD. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he call it up on Monday next instead of on Saturday. Every member is aware of the fact that it is impossible on Saturdays always to get a quorum, and I hope he will agree to postpone calling the bill up till Monday or Tuesday, and when so called up we can then dispose of it.

Mr. MCCREARY. I have been instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the bill as it has been stated and to give notice that the substitute reported by the committee, and which is to be treated as a new bill will be taken up for consideration on Saturday next immediately after the reading of the Journal. I am not certain whether the bill will consume more than one day.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I think it has been held heretofore that when the special privilege to report at any time has been given to a committee it loses that special privilege when report has been made and it goes upon the Calendar for consideration. The gentleman from Kentucky therefore had better report back his substitute and move to recommit, which motion can be called up by him at any time.

Mr. MCCREARY. I think the privilege goes with this bill until it is considered, and for that reason I do not agree with my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. DUNN. I merely raised the question so that there may be no doubt about it.

Mr. McCREARY. I think when the House agreed that the bill might be reported for consideration at any time, it is within the power of the House to agree that the bill may be called for consideration immediately after the reading of the Journal on the day I have named.

Mr. SPRINGER. It simply amounts, in the present instance, to postponing the consideration.

Mr. NELSON. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will couple with his suggestion a request that the bill and the report be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that it is a rule of uniform practice, and has been so held in the House without exception, as I understand it, that when a measure of this kind goes to the Calendar, whatever privilege it had is lost. It must be recommitted to the committee; and then, of course, it is within the power of the committee to report it at any time for consideration.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I will add to my first request that the bill be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with authority to report for consideration on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be the order.

Mr. HEARD. They have that privilege already.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be printed and recommitted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he still gives notice that he will ask to call this bill up on Saturday?

Mr. McCREARY. Yes, sir; immediately after the reading of the Journal.

I will further ask, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be printed in the RECORD, and that it be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. NELSON. That is the substitute proposed by the committee and the report?

Mr. McCREARY. The substitute is what I referred to; and that the same be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if there is any objection to printing the report in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. By all means let the report be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request to the House. Is there objection to printing the proposed substitute in the RECORD?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. What was determined about the report?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cause the report to be also printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

Mr. CANNON. The report and the substitute are both to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The substitute proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11309) to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing-vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President may deem it his duty to exercise any of the powers given to him by an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, it shall be lawful for the President in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend in whole or in part the transportation across the territory of the United States, in bond and without the payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country, from or to the British dominions in North America.

SEC. 2. That whenever the President shall be satisfied that there is any discrimination whatever in the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence River canals, the Chambly Canal, or either of them, whether by tolls, drawbacks, refund of tolls, or otherwise, which is or may be detrimental to the interests of the United States, or any of its citizens, it shall be lawful for the President in his discretion to issue a proclamation to that effect, whereupon there shall be collected a toll of 20 cents a ton upon every foreign vessel and her cargo passing through either the Sault Ste. Marie Canal or the St. Clair Flats Canal, and the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize and direct any of the customs officers to collect the tolls levied under this act, or the President may, in his discretion, when he is satisfied there is any such discrimination, prohibit the use of said canals to any such foreign vessel. The President, when satisfied that such discrimination has ceased, may issue his proclamation to that effect, in his discretion, whereupon the tolls authorized by this act shall no longer be collected, and such prohibition, if ordered, shall cease.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make any regulations needful to carry this act into effect.

The report (by Mr. McCREARY) is as follows:

Mr. McCREARY, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred H. R. 11257, "A bill to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act to protect and defend the rights of American fishermen," approved March 3, 1887, report favorably a substitute therefor, and recommend that H. R. 11257 be laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 5670) to provide for the construction of a revenue-cutter for New Berne, N. C., to replace the revenue-cutter Stevens; and

A bill (H. R. 2601) for the relief of the Baptist Female College at Lexington, Mo.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 320) for the relief of J. D. Adams;

A bill (S. 3482) to authorize the construction and operation of a wagon-road across the Pike's Peak reservation, in the State of Colorado;

A bill (S. 3364) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw, of New York; and

A bill (S. 3475) granting the use of certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma for the purpose of a public park.

FORT WALLACE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit a conference report at the earnest request of a member of the conference committee who wishes to be absent, but with the understanding with the gentleman from Illinois that if it occupies any time I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposition of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said Senate amendment insert:

"SEC. 2. That the Union Pacific Railroad Company is hereby granted the preference right for the period of three months after the appraisement herein provided for, to purchase the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 24, township 13 south, range 39 west, in fractional blocks 44, 49, 50, 51, 36, and 48, according to the town plat of the city of Wallace, the same being now occupied by said railroad company for depot and other purposes, at $30 per acre."

And the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
J. E. WASHINGTON,
E. J. TURNER,
Managers on the part of the House.
P. B. PLUMB,
H. M. TELLER,
JAMES H. BERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The managers on the part of the House submit the following report:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action on the Senate amendments recommended by the conference committee:

The bill as it passed the House extended to the Union Pacific Railroad Company the preference right for a period of three months to purchase certain of the lands within the city of Wallace, Kans., now occupied by said railroad company for depot and other purposes, at such price as might be fixed, without reference to the improvements thereon, by the Secretary of the Interior and at not less than $2.50 per acre. As agreed upon by the committee of conference, the said railroad company is granted the right to purchase the land mentioned at the price of $30 per acre, and no discretion is given to the Secretary of the Interior to charge a greater or less price for the land.

WM. S. HOLMAN,
J. E. WASHINGTON,
E. J. TURNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think a statement can be made briefer than the report. It is simply this: The Union Pacific Railroad, or the Kansas branch of it, passes over what is known as the Fort Wallace reservation. The railroad company had established its machine-shops and depots on the reservation and was occupying about 40 acres of land. The bill in its general scope provides for the disposition of part of the reservation to be sold under the homestead law. The House provided that the land occupied by the Union Pacific Railroad might be sold at a price to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, at not less than $2.50 an acre. The Senate struck out that provision, and that left this 40 acres in the position of not having the price determined. In a conference it has been agreed that as to that 40 acres, instead of the price being determined by the Secretary of the Interior, it shall be fixed at $30 an acre. I am not entirely satisfied with the conclusion arrived at, but I feel that after the conference we have had the report should be adopted.

The report of the conference committee was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the conference committee was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Oklahoma bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will take their places as tellers and resume the count.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 18, noes 60.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. HOOKER. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask that the roll be called.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Allen, Mass.	Dingley,	Kerr,	Reed,
Arnold,	Dougherty,	Ketcham,	Robertson,
Bankhead,	Dunham,	Laidlaw,	Rockwell,

The committee rose; and Mr. CRISP having taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having found itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had instructed him to report to the House the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and eighty-three members have answered to their names—more than a quorum; and the committee will, under the rule, resume its session without any business being transacted in the House.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places. On the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] 18 gentlemen have voted in the affirmative and 60 in the negative. All members who have not voted will pass between the tellers.

After completing the count, the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 127.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURNES in the chair). The noes have it, and the motion is rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "in legal manner to the commission provided for in this act" and insert "by the consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians, which shall be first obtained by a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, and said commission shall have reported that said consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians has been obtained."

Mr. HOOKER. I would add to my amendment—and any other tribes having interest there.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask my friend to withhold his amendment until we reach the eleventh section of the bill, where the President is authorized to appoint this commission. It is impossible to have everything in one section. I will read the section:

SEC. 11. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission, to be composed of five persons, not more than three of whom shall be members of one political party, whose duty it shall be to open negotiations with the Creeks, Seminoles, and Cherokees, for the purpose of securing the consent of said Indians, so far as it may be necessary, to the provisions of section 5 and section 6 of this act. The commission is authorized to enter into such agreements with said Indian tribes as it may deem necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, and shall submit the same to the President for his approval or rejection. The compensation of the members of said commission shall be at the rate of $10 per day; and they shall also be allowed, in addition thereto, their actual necessary traveling expenses, stationery, and postage. They shall have power to appoint a secretary, who shall receive a compensation of $6 per day, and such allowances for traveling expenses as he may actually incur.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It should be adopted, especially as you recognize that the Creeks and Seminoles have an interest in this land.

Mr. SPRINGER. If he wants to make an amendment in this respect, I would ask the gentleman to withhold his motion until it can be brought in at the right place. I want to get this bill so that if it pass it will read in consecutive order and the subjects will be in their proper sections.

Mr. HOOKER. I think this is the appropriate place for this amendment. We have other amendments which will be offered in the section to which the gentleman has just referred.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the clause be read as it will appear if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whenever the Cherokee tribe of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section by the consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians or any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein, which shall be first obtained by a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, and when said commission shall have reported that said consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians or any other tribe or tribes having interest therein shall be obtained and the President has issued his proclamation, etc.

Mr. HOOKER. I offered this amendment prior to the amendment which was offered by my friend from New York [Mr. BAKER] to another part of the bill, and I gave way for its consideration as it came first in order in the bill.

Now, it will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that section 6 of the bill provides, as it reads without amendment—

That whenever the Cherokee tribe of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section in legal manner.

There is nothing to say what the manner shall be. There is no provision to say how that consent shall be expressed, and if it is indeed and in truth an honest expression of opinion on the part of these Indians whether they desire the construction of a Territorial government over the land which belongs to them under the most solemn treaties of the Government, then I say it ought to be obtained before there is any effort to create that Territory.

In other words, as I understand the operation of the bill as proposed by the Committee on Territories, we are to go on and organize this Territory, and it virtually provides that this Territorial organization shall be operative over only the lands of those Indians who shall assent to it; so that at all times the non-assent of any Indian tribe may vary the boundary of the Territory and make it different from what it was. If gentlemen will look at the map which this Committee on Territories have prepared for the purpose of showing what proportion of the Indian Territory they propose to embrace in Oklahoma, they will observe that the dark part represents the portion of the Territory occupied by the five semi-civilized tribes, and the white part the lands now known as this Oklahoma Territory. It contains within its borders about one-half of the Indian Territory which was conceded by the Government of the United States to the five semi-civilized tribes to be theirs forever. The patents and treaties of the Government make it theirs.

Now, this bill proposes to take, I should judge, about one-half of this Indian Territory and constitute it into a Territory of the United States, with a regular Territorial government, and then, under subsequent provisions of the bill, a commission is to be appointed for the purpose of getting the assent of the various Indians who by the consent of the semi-civilized tribes have been settled as friendly Indians in their territory, among whom will be found the Cheyennes, the Arapahoes, the Wichitas, the Kiowas, the Comanches, the Uncas, the Iowas, the Chippewas, and various other tribes. These Indians are all settled upon this territory which it is now proposed to constitute a Territory of the United States, embracing, as it does, what is known as the Cherokee Outlet, which constitutes a very large proportion of this proposed territory. I say, therefore, that it is proper that the consent of these Indians should be had in the first place, and if the men who want to make a United States Territory out of these Indian lands are honest and earnest in their assertion that it is to be done with the assent of the Indians, then I say the obtaining of that assent ought to be preliminary to the organization of the new Territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to oppose the amendment. I understand the gentleman's point in favor of this proposition is that he desires all of the Indians in the Indian Territory to be consulted and their consent obtained before this Territorial government can be established. Is that correct?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, there are five civilized tribes in that Territory, and probably ten or fifteen other tribes living in various parts of it. The gentleman desires that we shall consult all of the Indians in the Territory. Of those other tribes one has only ninety-two members and another eighty-nine. They are living in remote parts of the Territory, and are not affected in any way by the claim of title to these lands.

It seems to me very unreasonable, and it is a thing that has never been done heretofore. When we acquired titles to the lands of the Indians in Kansas each tribe consented for itself; and it was so in Mississippi and in Georgia. These very Cherokees themselves agreed to relinquish their rights in Georgia and in Mississippi, and no other Indian tribes were consulted about it. This past winter we passed a bill allowing the Sioux Indians in Minnesota to relinquish a portion of their lands, 11,000,000 acres, and nobody claimed that their rights would be imperiled unless the bill contained a provision requiring all the other Indians in Minnesota, or in the whole Northwest to be consulted.

Mr. HOLMAN. But all the Indians on that reservation were consulted.

Mr. SPRINGER. All that owned the reservation were consulted, and there is the same requirement here. Now, if you adopt this amendment it will simply enable other tribes of Indians that have no real interest in these lands to come to the Government and levy blackmail and demand that they shall be paid something before these Indians shall be allowed to relinquish the lands which they own and in which the others have no right whatever. If the gentleman wants to protect the rights of the Indians why not let the Cherokees attend to their own business, and let the Seminoles attend to their business, and settle it in a legal way? And by "a legal way" I mean this: They have their Legislature and their Council, which the gentleman himself has extolled in the highest terms, and why not allow them to determine the manner in which the assent of these Indians shall be given? It is Democratic to allow the Cherokee Nation to say for itself in what manner it shall dispose of its lands to the Government. It can sell to no other purchaser.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that this would make it possible for some other tribe or tribes to levy blackmail upon the Government seems to me hardly justified, for the reason that before those tribes can have a status before the commission they must establish the fact that they have an interest—not merely that they claim an interest, but that they have one.

Again, Congress has already recognized the fact that the Creeks and Seminoles have an interest in this land, for by the act of March 3, 1885, it was provided—

That the President is hereby authorized to open negotiations with the Creeks Seminoles, and Cherokees for the purpose of opening to settlement under the homestead laws the unassigned lands in said Indian Territory ceded by them respectively to the United States by the several treaties of August 11, 1866, March 21, 1866, and July 19, 1866; and for that purpose the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, his action hereunder to be reported to Congress.

Mr. WARNER. Is there anything in the law just read by the gentleman which requires one tribe to consent for another, or which contemplates that each tribe can not consent for itself?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The law expressly recognizes the fact that these Indians are interested——

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman answer my question? Is there a word or a syllable in the law which the gentleman has read that requires the consent of one tribe to be dependent upon that of another?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. This is a quotation from the act of 1885——

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I will answer it. I have read from the act of 1885, providing for the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to treat with these Indians; and that act recognizes that these Indians have an interest——

Mr. WARNER. A joint interest in each piece of land?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Whatever the interest may be——

Mr. WARNER. I ask the gentleman to treat this question as a lawyer. Let him read the law and answer whether there is a word in it which makes the consent of one tribe dependent upon the consent of another.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It recegnizes the fact that under the treaty referred to these Indians have an interest in this Territory, and that interest, as specified in the treaties, consists in the right to object to the Government of the United States throwing around those lands a State or Territorial form of government.

Now, the amendment suggested by my friend from Mississippi proposes to recognize what has already been recognized by the Congress of the United States in its treatment of these Indians.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi goes to this extent: that although the Cherokees may consent, although the Creeks and Seminoles may consent, although the Chickasaws and Choctaws and every tribe or band of Indians interested in the proposed Territory of Oklahoma may consent, but if a band of 92 Indians should fail to give its consent, the proceedings under the commission, although all other tribes consented, would be nullified. That is the effect of the amendment, stripped of all verbiage. It assumes that each tribe has a joint interest with all the other tribes. I say that the treaties were made with each tribe separately. There is not a word or a line in any treaty making the disposition of land by one tribe subject to the consent of any other tribe or band. In the law read by the gentleman [Mr. BAKER], although several tribes are mentioned to be treated with, there is no intimation that the consent of the Cherokees should depend upon that of the Choctaws or that of any other tribe named.

This bill simply provides that the Cherokees, who have an interest in this outlet (and what may be the interest of the Cherokees it is unnecessary at this time to discuss), shall have a right to dispose of that interest in the same way as they had a right to dispose of the 800,000 acres that they sold to Mr. Joy. So with the Creeks and Seminoles; the bill assumes that they have a right to dispose of their lands without the interference or consent of the Cherokees.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard some talk of corporation influence in this matter. I am not here to cry out "robber" against the cattle syndicates or any such organization; but it is a fact that a syndicate does occupy a domain equal in area to the State of Massachusetts, and it occupies it comparatively without money and without price, without the payment of a cent of taxation upon any property there. If the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi should be adopted, that syndicate will have an interest in encouraging these small bands of Indians, by argument or by something more persuasive than argument, to stand out against any proposition which may be made by the commission or any terms which may be acceded to by the other tribes, however just. The amendment will simply have the effect of blocking the way to the opening of this territory. It is a measure the effect of which—I will not say it is so intended—will be directly in the interest of the men who say that this territory shall not be opened to actual settlers, whatever consent may be obtained from the Cherokees, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, or other tribes. This amendment is in the same line as other amendments presented in the early stage of this discussion.

Mr. PERKINS. When the Government of the United States was negotiating with the Cherokees to open the Cherokee Strip to settlement to other Indians and freedmen, was it found necessary to negotiate with other Indians located there to get their consent before that could be done?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir. There has been something said about the Cherokees and Chickasaws in reference to the southern portion of what is now called the Territory of Oklahoma, which was in the first place leased by those tribes to the General Government? In 1866 they ceded that land for an additional compensation of $300,000. The money was paid to them for the land by the United States without any condition as to the settlement of friendly Indians, freedmen, or anybody else upon it. It was ceded without condition to the United States. The consent of the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, or any other Indians was never asked, nor was there ever an intimation that their consent was necessary to the validity of the cession. And so it was in regard to Oklahoma. When the Creeks and Seminoles were treated with, what was their opinion as to Oklahoma Territory? It was not suggested other Indians should be settled there or that the Government should negotiate with other Indians to get their consent to the cession.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARNES. I move to strike out the last word. I do not propose to make a speech; I propose merely to read the opinion of Carl Schurz, Secretary of the Interior, in response to what has just fallen from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER]. Speaking about this very cession he says:

The title acquired by the Government by the treaties of 1866 was secured in pursuance and furtherance of the same purpose of Indian settlement which is the foundation of the original scheme. That purpose was the removal of Indian tribes from the limits of the political, State, and Territorial organizations, and their permanent location upon other lands sufficient for the needs of each tribe. These lands being ample in area for the purpose, it has become a settled policy to locate other tribes thereon as fast as arrangements can be made, and provisions have been constantly made by treaties, agreements, and acts of Congress to effect these objects. The purpose is expressly declared in the said treaties. The cessions of the Creeks and Seminoles are stated to have been made "in compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon." These words must be held to create a trust equivalent to what would have been imposed had the language been "for the purpose of locating Indians and freedmen thereon." The lands ceded by the Choctaws and Chickasaws were by article 9 of the treaty of June 22, 1855, leased to the United States * * * for the permanent settlement of the Wichita and such other tribes or bands of Indians as the Government may desire to locate thereon.

I call attention to these words:

For the permanent settlement of the Wichita and such other tribes or bands of Indians as the Government may desire to locate thereon.

He continues:

The treaty of 1866 substituted a direct purchase for the lease, but did not extinguish or alter the trust.

It could not do so, because the lease which was made in 1855 was made for permanent and not for temporary settlement.

Mr. WARNER. Let me ask the gentleman a question as a lawyer. I lease from him a house, occupying it for a certain purpose——

Mr. BARNES. That is not it.

Mr. WARNER. Let me ask the gentleman a question as a lawyer. I lease from him a house for ten years for a certain purpose, and before the expiration of the time for which the lease runs he makes me a warranty deed without any condition, can not I occupy it for whatever purpose I may see fit?

Mr. BARNES. That is not this case.

Mr. WARNER. It is just this case.

Mr. BARNES. It is not this case, because in the treaty of 1855—I came, Mr. Chairman, very nearly saying may it please your honor, under the suggestion of the gentleman, as if we were making a legal argument—but under the treaty of 1855, when the lease was made, it was understood that it was made for the purpose of securing a permanent home, and not for a temporary purpose. In fact, it was not a lease. The treaty of 1866 merely converts the term "lease" into "purchase." It could not change the character of the home provided for the tribe located thereon from a permanent home. So Carl Schurz, Secretary of the Interior, in passing on this question, says:

The treaty of 1866 substituted a direct purchase for the lease, but did not extinguish or alter the trust.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman says the Secretary of the Interior says it was a lease.

Mr. BARNES. No, I do not say so.

Mr. WARNER. How was it then; was it a purchase or a lease?

Mr. BARNES. The Secretary of the Interior said that "the treaty of 1866 substituted a direct purchase for the lease, but did not extinguish or alter the trust." That is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, Carl Shurz, and that has been the ruling and construction of the Government ever since the treaty of 1866 was made. The relation which existed between the Choctaws and Chickasaws of the one part and the United States Government of the other part under the treaty of 1855 was the relation of lessor and lessee. The relation which existed between the same parties under the treaty of 1866 was vendor and vendee, but whether the Government held as lessee or vendee, it nevertheless held these lands as a trustee—holding the same as a permanent home for the Wichitas and such other tribes or bands of Indians as the Government might desire to locate thereon. The lease became a deed, but the trust remained the same under the deed which it was under the lease. I repeat, then, in the language of the Secretary, that while the treaty substituted a direct purchase for the lease, it did not extinguish or alter the trust. The ruling of the Department of the Interior has always been in conformity with this opinion.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to reply to what has been said by the gentleman on the other side as to the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like first that consent should be given to limit debate upon this section.

Mr. HOOKER. I shall object to that at present.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not object. We have been on it for a long time. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HOOKER. I shall confine myself to the five-minute rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. By that rule the debate is already exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi for five minutes.

Mr. HOOKER. The words I propose to strike out in the original bill of the committee are the words "in legal manner to the commission provided for in this act," which are found in the second and third lines of section 6, and insert instead of them the words:

By the consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians, or any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein, which shall be first obtained by a commission appointed by the President of the United States; and when said commission shall have reported that said consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians, or any other tribe or tribes having an interest, has been obtained, etc.

Those words I propose to insert in place of the vague, uncertain, indefinite, and if I may be permitted to so designate them, inaccurate terms employed in the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me a moment.

Mr. HOOKER. Not now.

But the gentleman on the other side, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] certainly leaves out of view in the discussion of the amendment I have offered the very gravamen of the amendment itself, as well as the object it has in contemplation, for even your own bill, gentlemen, proposes to obtain the consent of every Indian tribe.

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is all that is required.

Mr. HOOKER. And he says that one tribe can not consent for another.

Now, I say it is a violation of the treaty stipulations with these tribes to undertake to enact this legislation, because you make a Territory of lands contiguous to the five civilized tribes, and you do it without their consent at all, and yet according to your own admissions they have an interest. But taking the view of those gentlemen supporting the bill, and those who have reported it, that it is essential to get the consent of each tribe to be affected by this provision, you can not avoid the effect of your own bill in this respect, that each tribe must consent for itself, and that you must have the consent of all of them, for every foot of land in the Indian Territory that you propose to place in this Territory of Oklahoma is subject to the provisions of the treaties in which they are interested, and since the Cherokees own this outlet, necessarily you must get their consent. Hence, before you go to the extent of creating the Territorial form of government there, over this Territory, with all of the machinery and appliances belonging to a Territory of the United States, you should appoint a commission first to obtain the consent of the Indians interested in this matter, and your own bill shows that you intend to do that if you are in earnest in your assertions. The difference is that I hold this assent should be obtained first. You claim that it may be obtained afterwards.

My proposition is that the President of the United States shall be authorized, through the commission proposed to be appointed, to obtain this consent in advance. Let the Indians assent to the proposition first to establish this Territory. Primarily and necessarily you must obtain their consent to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask a question.

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do you say that we must get the consent of the five tribes before this can be done?

Mr. HOOKER. Before you can organize a Territory?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; before we can establish a Territory west of them on lands they do not own?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, sir; I do. I say that you are violating the spirit of the treaty when you undertake to establish a Territory there, without their consent, over any portion of this land which, under the policy of the Government, has been, since the very first of these treaties with the Indians, set apart to be known as the Indian Territory and to be exclusively used for that purpose.

There is no foot of land in your proposed Territory of Oklahoma, except a little part of this Public Land Strip, a small parallelogram up here, shown on this map, containing 3,672,640 acres of land, but that belongs to the Indians under these treaties; and I insist that of the lands belonging to the Indian Territory which was to be theirs forever and which was granted to them expressly by the terms of the treaties, you have no right to take possession and undertake to form a separate organization over it in the shape of a Territorial government without the consent of the Indians themselves. I say that they have not relinquished an interest in the Territory because they have settled actually only that portion of the Territory which is covered on this map by the dark lines; and the mere fact that they have not occupied the entire Territory is not a forfeiture under any conditions of the treaties of their interest in the balance of the Territory. All of that land remains to them, and they can not be divested of it without their own consent. All of it remains subject to the condition to have settled on it by the Government only friendly tribes, and even then by the consent of the five civilized tribes. If your bill means what you claim it does, and what it appears on its face to mean, you have got to get their consent.

My amendment is, as I have already said, that this assent shall be first obtained in advance of any action on the part of Congress forming a Territorial government over this land; that the Indians shall be consulted; that their consent shall be obtained before their lands can be organized into a Territory of the United States. In contradistinction to that amendment we have the bill of this committee which proposes to take possession of these lands, which by the solemn policy of this Government in all of its treaties from 1793 to 1866 say was intended to be devoted exclusively to the settlement of Indians and to the exclusion of white men. That is the main object of my amendment, that the assent of the Indians shall be obtained before you undertake to organize this Territory.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The Chair will assume the pro forma amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I renew it for the purpose of making a few suggestions in response to what the gentleman from Mississippi has said.

I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Whether the gentleman says this as I understand him, that we can not organize a Territory of this Government over these lands without the consent of the Indians?

Mr. HOOKER. You mean with regard to this Oklahoma Territory?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOOKER. Why, you say so yourself. It is in your own bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have reference now to the right of the Government to organize a Territory over the five civilized tribes.

Mr. HOOKER. You ought to have the consent of these tribes before doing it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has not my friend himself favored the organization of a Territory there without the consent of the tribes?

Mr. HOOKER. No, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I say the gentleman has, and beg his pardon for so flatly contradicting him.

Mr. HOOKER. I think the gentleman is in error. I am in favor, if you make it a Territory at all, of making it an Indian Territory, with representation here on this floor. But I do say that you have no right, in view of our treaties with these Indians, to take possession of their lands without obtaining their consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. We can organize an Indian Territory over the whole of it without their consent.

Mr. HOOKER. Oh, no; not except in violation of your pledges.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman himself has favored a bill to that effect.

Mr. HOOKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I never did.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I can show the gentleman that my assertion is correct.

Mr. HOOKER. I think the gentleman will find some difficulty in doing that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hold in my hand a bill which was introduced in the Forty-fourth Congress, and which was reported unanimously from the Committee on Indian Affairs by the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. Wilshire, then a member of Congress.

Mr. HOOKER. What is the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. It provides for organizing the Indian Territory, and says:

The Indian country west of Missouri and Arkansas, bounded on the east by the lines of those States, on the south by that of Texas, and on the north by that of Kansas, and on the west by that of Texas, etc., shall be and is hereby erected into a province to bear the name of the "Province of Oklahoma."

At that time the gentleman and his committee, for he was then a member of that committee, did not undertake to call it a Territory; but it provides a Territorial government for the whole of the Indian Territory without the consent of the tribes; and here is a report unanimously submitted from that committee in favor of that organization.

Mr. HOOKER. Read it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The report goes on, after describing the Territory which it is proposed to create, to explain the reasons for the use of the word "Province," and gives an apology in the report for using that word instead of "Territory," by stating that the Indians had a prejudice against the word "Territory," being under the impression that it would give some sort of control over them that they were unwilling to have exercised, and hence it was called a "Province." In this connection the report goes on to say:

This just pride, this high and honorable sentiment, is respected by the bill which we submit, and its provisions in no degree diminish or affect the nationality of the civilized tribes; and respecting even their prejudice against the word "Territory," which seems to them to contain a menace, and against incorporation whereunto they deem themselves guarantied by treaties, we propose to call the political organism contemplated by the bill, as the Romans called Gaul and Britain, "Provinces."

[Laughter and applause.]

And the gentleman from Mississippi, a member then of the Committee on Indian Affairs, assented to that report. Not only that; but in the latter session of that Congress the gentleman assented to another report on a bill which proposed to organize a Territorial government for that Territory under the name of the Territory of Oklahoma.

Mr. PAYSON. Is not that barred by the statute of limitations? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. This is a bill to organize the "Territory" of Oklahoma. It does not stop at a "province," but it "goes the whole hog," and proposes to organize a "Territory," with a governor, three judges, and all the usual officials, to be appointed by the President of the United States. That Territorial government was to be put in operation without asking the consent of any tribe in the whole Territory; and I have here the bill reported from the Committee on Territories at the last session of that Congress, to which the gentleman gave his assent. Does he deny that?

Mr. HOOKER. I will reply to the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. I think something has been said during this discussion to the effect that the breaking up of the tribal relation is a violation of treaty obligations. Now, every one of these reports says that the only salvation of the Indians is the breaking up of the tribal relation, and the allotment of lands to them in severalty.

Mr. SPRINGER. One of the provisions of this bill gives each tribe the right to dispose of its own lands without consulting anybody else. There was a report submitted on this subject in that Congress which was written by a very distinguished gentleman, Professor Seelye, who was a member of the Forty-fourth Congress, and also a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I have in my possession a copy of the report written by that distinguished gentleman and eminent philanthropist, and submitted to this House in favor of the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, and it contained no proposition to ask the assent of anybody. To that report, which I will have printed with my remarks, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] gave his consent. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. HOOKER. We will see about that when we get there.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, we will see about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has expired.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], when he looked at this report, if he had read the whole of it, would have found that the bill to which it relates proposed to organize a Territorial government for those Indians because they were civilized and capable of conducting and carrying on a civilized government. Why, sir, there is not a treaty made with the Indians that does not provide that they shall have the right to a Territorial government for themselves whenever they want it, and it was not in opposition to the views of these Indians, but with their consent and because they desired it, that any proposition of that sort was made here.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. They sent a petition to the next Congress remonstrating in the most earnest and solemn terms against the proposition.

Mr. HOOKER. On the contrary, sir, it will be found by the very terms of the report itself that it proposed to create these lands into a Territory for those Indians because they were in a civilized condition. I beg to call attention to some portions of the report which the gentleman from Illinois did not read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not read it at all, but I will print it.

Mr. HOOKER. No; you referred to it and endeavored to create the impression that there was an attempt to set up a government over these Indians against their objection and remonstrance.

I read from the report:

The Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Choctaws, and Chickasaws are neither nomads, barbarians, nor pagans. They are civilized and Christian peoples, living under settled government and laws wisely adapted to their simple needs. They are peaceful, law-abiding, orderly, and moral, freer of vice or crime than almost any other people in the world. They have been more than forty years neighbors of the people of Arkansas and Missouri, and in all that time the laws of good neighborhood have not been broken on either side, nor has the power of the United States ever had to be called upon to keep the peace upon that frontier.

The men of these five tribes are agriculturists, having comfortable homes and farms, and largely engaged in raising cattle. The Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws have written constitutions of government, laws printed in their own and the English language, Legislatures, each composed of an upper and lower house, and county, circuit, and supreme courts of justice. The Creeks and the Seminoles have departed less from their ancient form of government; but they are well and wisely governed by lawmakers and elective chiefs.

The most striking characteristics of these people are truthfulness, strict fidelity to their promises, and singular honesty. They never betray a trust or break a promise. They have never, in even the slightest matter, violated a treaty; it needs no oath to make it sure that their testimony shall be true; and they have not yet learned how to cheat their creditors by fraudulent devices.

By the report of the Board of Indian Commissioners for 1872 and the tables of comparative statistics therein given it was shown that in population, number of acres cultivated, products, wealth, valuation, and school statistics the Indian Territory was equal to any one of the organized Territories of the United States, and far ahead of most of them. It has a smaller area than any other and a larger population than any excepting Utah and New Mexico. It has more acres of land under cultivation than Washington, over one-third more than Utah, and twice as many as Colorado or Montana.

The bill to which that report relates was a proposition to create a Territory within the Indian Territory for the Indians. The proposition which is now submitted for a Territory to be called Oklahoma is upon its face a proposition to make it a white man's Territory to the exclusion of the Indian. It was said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], in advocating this measure, that they wanted this Territory to be created not because they desired to preserve the Indians, not because they desired to preserve the Indian Territory in its integrity in their possession, but because they desired that white men should enter it and take possession of it—a very different proposition from that which was formerly submitted and to which the gentleman from Illinois has called attention.

I insert here a copy of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, being H. R. 2823 of the first session Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. Wilshire, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following bill as a substitute for the bill H. R. 1923:

A bill to provide a government for the Indian Territory.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Indian country west of Missouri and Arkansas, bounded on the east by the lines of these States, on the south by that of Texas, on the north by that of Kansas, and on the west by that of Texas, and its western line from the initial monument prolonged northward shall be, and is hereby, erected into a province, to bear the name of the Province of Oklahoma.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act the title to their land, in the province aforesaid, of the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Seminoles, Chickasaws, Osages, Peorias, Kaskaskias, Weas, Quapaws, Senecas, Shawnees, Senecas and Shawnees, Ottawas, and Wyandots, shall be a fee-simple absolute, without possibility of reverter or escheat to the United States, and with power of absolute free disposition and alienation and of partition and holding in severalty in fee.

SEC. 3. That all other rights of property of the tribes or individual Indians in the said province, and the laws, customs, and usages of each tribe, and all its powers of domestic legislation, and the powers and jurisdiction of its courts and tribunals of justice, shall remain unaffected by this act, and the legislative and judicial power of each shall extend to all persons being and residing in each, and to all corporations having franchises and property therein.

SEC. 4. That the Cherokee, Choctaw, Creek, Seminole, and Chickasaw Nations shall be henceforward, in law, a body politic and corporate, and by such name shall have the right to act and contract, and may sue and be sued in the courts of the United States, and in the Court of Claims, and elsewhere assert and maintain any cause of action, right, claim, or demand for moneys due them by the United States, legal or equitable, by virtue of treaty, contract, or otherwise, and to be heard therein by counsel of their own choice; and for any cause of action, ex contractu or ex delicto, for use and occupation or waste, may sue in the circuit court of the United States for the State or district in which such corporation has its domicil.

SEC. 5. That the citizens of each of said nations shall have the like right to sue in the Court of Claims upon any just demand against the United States under treaty or act of Congress.

SEC. 6. That there shall be a governor of the province of Oklahoma, appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and a provincial secretary in like manner appointed, each for the term of four years, revocable by the President at pleasure; and there shall be paid to the governor a salary of $3,000, and to the provincial secretary a salary of $2,000, each payable quarterly at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 7. That there shall be a legislative council for the said province, to be styled the provincial council, whereof the Cherokee, Creek, and Choctaw Nations shall each have two councilors; the Seminole, Chickasaw, and Osage Nations one each; and the small tribes named in the second section of this act collectively one; each to be elected by the qualified voters of his nation, tribe, or tribes, and to hold his office for the term of four years from the 1st day of October next after his election: Provided, That all male citizens of any of said tribes or nations, over the age of twenty-one years, who may have resided in such nation six months prior to any election held therein under this act, except idiots, lunatics, and persons convicted of a felony, shall be qualified voters at any election held under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That the members of the provincial council shall convene at the seat of government of the province on the first Monday of October, 1876, and on the same day of every second year thereafter; and the governor shall appoint one of them to be the president of the council, who shall appoint a secretary and a sergeant-at-arms; and the council shall be invested with the functions of a provincial legislature, with power to legislate in regard to all matters of intertribal and general interest nor interfering with the local legislation of each nation and tribe, nor contravening any law of the United States, and to enact laws providing for the administration of the property of persons not citizens of either of the nations named above dying in said province, or elsewhere, when such property is found in the province, and regulating whatever may concern the affairs of the province at large.

SEC. 9. That the provincial council shall be the exclusive judge of the elections and qualifications of its own members. None of its enactments shall have force of law without the approval of the governor. It shall not sit more than twenty days at any one time, and the governor may, by proclamation, convene it at any time in special session. Its members shall be paid $5 per day for every day while in session, and for every 35 miles travel going and returning from and to their homes. The secretary shall be paid $5 for each day, and the sergeant-at-arms $3 for each day, while the provincial council is in session, out of the Treasury of the United States, upon the certificate of the president of the council, approved by the governor, and through the marshal of the province.

SEC. 10. That the seat of government of the province shall be at Eufaula, in the Creek country, where the governor and secretary shall reside and the provincial council shall hold its sessions.

SEC. 11. That the provincial council may create corporations for purposes of internal improvement and manufacturing, but shall charter no bank and create no provincial debt. It shall pass such laws as may be necessary to preserve peace and harmony among the nations and tribes, secure the apprehension and delivery of criminals and fugitives from justice, and fraudulent debtors from any State or elsewhere, rid the province of vagabonds and worthless and desperate persons, and protect the general rights and interests of the people; but shall have no power to levy taxes or impose excise or other duties or imposts under any guise or pretense whatever.

SEC. 12. That the governor shall have the whole executive power, and shall see faithfully executed, everywhere in the province, the laws of the United States in force therein and the laws of the provincial council, and in each nation or tribe its local and domestic laws, customs, and usages, to which end he shall have power, whenever it may be necessary, to call for aid upon the military force of the United States, to act under the direction of the marshal or other officer appointed by the governor, and in other respects the governor and provincial secretary shall have the powers and perform the duties, so far as may be consistent with the purposes of this act, of the governors and secretaries of state of any State of the Union.

SEC. 13. That there shall be created for the said province a provincial circuit court, to be composed of a chief judge and two associate judges, citizens of the United States, each appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned for six years, and removable only by impeachment, each of whom shall reside at the seat of government of the province, and receive a salary of $3,500 per annum, payable quarterly, out of the Treasury of the United States; a provincial attorney and a marshal of the province, to be in like manner appointed, and removable at the pleasure of the President, each of whom shall reside at the seat of government of the province; the salary of the attorney shall be $1,500 per annum, and the salary and compensation of the marshal shall be the same as that allowed the marshal of the Territory of New Mexico.

SEC. 14. That the said provincial circuit court shall have the powers and jurisdiction of both a district and circuit court of the United States, within and for the whole of said province, so far as the laws of the United States may be in force therein, in civil and criminal matters, and in matters of seizure and admiralty jurisdiction, and to enforce the laws enacted by the provincial council.

SEC. 15. That each of the nations above named may, as a body politic and corporate, sue any persons, not its own citizens, in said district court sitting as a circuit court, upon any cause of action, legal or equitable, upon contract or for tort, and have such judgment, decree, and relief as of right it should have. And the said court shall also have jurisdiction of civil suits at law or in equity, by one of said nations against another, or between citizens or a citizen of one of said nations and a citizen or citizens of another; and this jurisdiction shall attach, although of two or more plaintiffs all may not be of a nation or nations different from that of all or part of the defendants, if one plaintiff be a citizen of one nation and one defendant of another. But the said court shall have no jurisdiction of any suit by an individual or individuals, or by a corporation, against either of said nations.

SEC. 16. That the said court shall also have jurisdiction of suits at law or in equity, instituted by e ther of the said nations or tribes, or any of its citizen or citizens, against any corporation not domiciled in said province, but having franchises, property, or interests therein, and between either of the said nations and tribes, and a citizen or citizens of the United States or a corporation; but no corporation or citizen of the United States shall have right of action in said court against any citizen or citizens of said nations or tribes, except on contracts made, and other causes of action arising, after the passage of this act: Provided, That the said court shall not have jurisdiction of any suit at law or in equity between individuals, or between a corporation and an individual or individuals, unless the amount in controversy, or the value of the thing in controversy, is not less than $500.

SEC. 17. That the rules of practice and modes of procedure in the said provincial court, and the forms of writs and modes of summoning and compelling attendance of witnesses and jurors, shall be the same as in the circuit court of the United States for Missouri; and the fees of bailiff, witnesses, and jurors shall be the same as in that court, with the same allowances for traveling expenses as are allowed by law therein.

SEC. 18. That the whole province of Oklahoma shall constitute one judicial circuit, divided into three judicial districts: First, the Cherokee district, consisting of all the province lying north of the country owned by the Choctaws and Chickasaws and Creeks in 1850; second, the Creek district, consisting of the country owned by the Creeks and Seminoles in 1850; and, third, the Choctaw district, consisting of the country owned by the Choctaws and Chickasaws in 1850.

SEC. 19. That there shall be six terms of the said provincial circuit court (any two of the judges constituting a quorum) holden in each year, each to continue not more than thirty days: two at Tahlequah, in the Cherokee district, on the first Mondays of April and October; two at Okmulkee, in the Creek district, on the first Mondays of May and November; and two at Atoka, in the Choctaw district, on the first Mondays of June and December; and each of said courts shall proceed in civil and criminal matters in all respects as the circuit and district courts of the United States, and appeals and writs of error from the final judgments and decrees of said provincial district and circuit court may be taken or prosecuted in the same manner and with like effect as appeals and writs of error are taken and prosecuted from the United States district and circuit courts of the State of Missouri.

SEC. 20. That the judges shall appoint a clerk of the court for each district, who shall reside and have his office at the place therein where the court for his district is held. The marshal or a deputy marshal shall attend each session of the court, and the marshal shall have such number of deputies, and no more, as the court shall, upon his application, authorize; and no deputy shall act until his appointment is approved by the court or one of the judges thereof. The judges may also appoint a bailiff of the court in each district, and fix his compensation, and as many interpreters as may be necessary, and fix their compensation; and the accounts of the marshal, for all costs, allowances, and expenses paid, shall be settled and approved by the court, and be paid upon the certificate of two of the judges.

SEC. 21. That the marshal and his deputies and bailiffs shall be citizens of one or other of the nations or tribes of Indians inhabiting the said province; and all of such Indians who can understand the English language when spoken shall be competent jurors, grand and petit, of the said court, in all cases whatever.

SEC. 22. That civil suits at law or in equity against individuals shall be instituted in the court of the district in which the defendant or one of the defendants may reside or be found; and when, of several defendants, some reside in other districts, process may be served upon them where they reside or may be found. Criminal prosecutions shall be instituted in the districts where the accused may reside, if he have a residence in the province, and, if not, then where he may be found.

SEC. 23. That so soon as the clerks of said courts are appointed and enter upon the discharge of their duties, the clerk of the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, on being notified thereof, shall transmit to the provincial secretary all indictments and other papers in criminal cases in that court pending against any and all persons charged with the commission of offenses in the Indian country, and exemplifications of the record in each such case, which shall have the same force and effect in all respects as the original record if authenticated by the certificate of the clerk and seal of the court; and the provincial secretary shall transmit such indictments, papers, and exemplifications to the clerks of the courts in the respective divisions in which the defendants resided when the offenses were committed; or if they did not reside in either, or if it is not known in which they resided, then to the clerk of the court for the first division; and on receipt thereof by such clerk of either division, the district court of the province sitting for that division shall be possessed of, and have complete and full jurisdiction of, the case, as if the parties had been indicted therein.

SEC. 24. That persons so indicted, who may be in custody, shall be so held until duly demanded by writ of habeas corpus, for the purpose of trial or otherwise, by said district court of the province; and persons so indicted who may have been bailed and be at large on bail shall appear at the first term of the court for the district to which their cases may thus have been transferred, or their bail be forfeited; and all witnesses summoned or recognized to appear in such case shall in like manner appear before the court to which the jurisdiction of the case in which they are to testify may be transferred, held for the division in which such cases are to be tried.

SEC. 25. That the records of the courts of general and appellate jurisdiction of the Cherokees, Choctaws, Creeks, Seminoles, and Chickasaws shall have the same faith and credit, and their judgments and decrees the same force and effect everywhere, as the records, judgments, and decrees of courts of the Territories of the United States; and exemplifications of the records and proceedings of such courts, when authenticated like those of the courts of the States, under the laws of the United States, shall have the same force and effect as those of such courts of the United States.

SEC. 26. That the courts of the said nations shall have power and jurisdiction to enforce the civil and criminal laws of their respective nations, except as to offenses punishable under the laws of the United States alone, within the territorial limits of each, against all persons found therein, and all corporations there domiciled, having property, contracting or offending, with like power to enforce their judgments and decrees as the courts of general jurisdiction of the Territories of the United States.

SEC. 27. That the governor shall appoint such notaries public in each nation as may be desired, and fix the fees to be charged by each, and the provincial council may define their powers, and their acts done in pursuance of such laws shall be valid and have the same effect as those of notaries public in Louisiana.

SEC. 28. That the notaries public so appointed, and the judges of the several courts of said nations, shall have the power to solemnize the rites of matrimony.

SEC. 29. That until the provincial council shall enact laws to prevent the introduction for sale into said province of spirituous and intoxicating liquors, any person who shall, from any place beyond the limits of said province, introduce, carry, or send into any part of said province, any spirituous and intoxicating liquors, intended to be sold and retailed therein, shall, on conviction thereof in said district court, be punished under the laws now in force in regard to such offense; but it shall not be unlawful for any one to import into said province such liquors for his own use or for medicinal purposes; and no other provisions of the laws in regard to the introduction of liquors into the Indian country shall hereafter be in force in the Cherokee, Creek, Seminole, Choctaw, or Chickasaw country.

SEC. 30. That the United States will, at the request of either of said nations, cause to be surveyed the lands owned by it, and each nation may establish land offices, and thereat sell the same at such prices as its Legislature may fix, and may also establish offices of registry and record of patents, conveyances, wills, and other instruments.

SEC. 31. That inasmuch as the Choctaws and Chickasaws are joint owners of the lands occupied by both, the consent of both nations must be had before any of their lands can be sold or disposed of; and if they can not agree upon division of them, either of those nations may file in the district court of the province, sitting as a circuit court, its bill in equity, to have partition of the joint lands, according to their respective rights and interests, by commissioners, under decree of the court, to be proceeded in and carried into effect as other suits and decrees in equity; service of subpœna or other process on the principal chief of the defendant nation being sufficient.

SEC. 32. That the offices of superintendent of Indian affairs for the Southwestern superintendency, and of agents for the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Senecas, and other small tribes in the second section of this act mentioned, are hereby abolished, and the papers of all such offices shall be placed in the custody of the provincial secretary; and the agents for the other tribes in said province shall hereafter be under the supervision and control of the governor of the province, and report to him.

SEC. 33. That the governor of such province shall cause to be selected and designated by metes and bounds reservations for the various bands of the Comanches or Neums, and of the Caiawas, in that part of said province that lies west of the ninety-eighth parallel of west longitude and south of the Arkansas River, and shall, if practicable, by negotiation, induce the said bands to settle thereon and to engage in stock-raising and agriculture; to which end he may agree, on the part of the United States, to furnish them with cattle, implements of husbandry, and other articles necessary to their comfort, and may employ proper persons to assist them in their agricultural labors, and physicians to reside among them, at such rates of compensation as he may find necessary to secure the services of competent and fit persons, for which purpose he may draw from time to time the necessary sums from the Treasury of the United States, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 34. That there shall be erected, under the direction and supervision of the governor of the province, a house and other necessary buildings for the governor, and offices for himself and the secretary, at the seat of government of the province, and court-houses and offices for the clerks and marshals at Tahlequah, Okmulkee, and Atoka, of modest dimensions and at moderate cost, according to plans and estimates to be prepared by the Secretary of War or under his direction; the account therefor shall be audited by the governor and paid at the Treasury of the United States; and the necessary safes, furniture, books, and seats, stationery, and other articles for the several courts and offices shall be purchased by the provincial secretary, and the accounts be audited at the Treasury; and estimates for all salaries and other provincial expenditures shall be in due time furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, with those for expenses of Territories.

SEC. 35. That one Delegate, to be entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States, to represent the people of said province, with the same privileges, rights, and compensation as Delegates from the Territories, may hereafter be elected by the qualified electors in the said province. Such Delegate shall be a citizen of some one of the nations or tribes composing said province, and the elections for the same shall be holden on the first Monday of September, in the year 1876, and every two years thereafter, at the several places for voting in the several nations or tribes, in accordance with the election laws of each; and the returns of such elections shall be made to the provincial secretary, who shall cast up and arrange the same in the presence of the governor of the province; and the governor shall issue, under the seal of said province, a certificate of election to the person receiving the highest number of votes for such Delegate, which shall be countersigned by the secretary of the province.

SEC. 36. That when the lands of the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Osages shall have been patented in severalty among the people of said nations or tribes, with title in fee in each individual entitled to the same, after making reservation of one thirty-sixth part thereof for purposes of education, the people of said province may assemble in convention by their delegates, in pursuance of regulations to be prescribed by the provincial council, and adopt a State constitution, to be presented to the Congress of the United States, for admission as a State; such constitution shall have no force or effect for any purpose whatever until the same shall be acted upon and approved by Congress.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that the question up for consideration in the Forty-fourth Congress on the 24th March, 1876 (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 1948), was not whether the bill should pass or even be considered, but was up on a contest of jurisdiction between the Committee on Territories and the Committee on Indian Affairs as to which should have jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

When the question as to which one of these committees should have cognizance of this bill, the Committee on Territories or the Committee on Indian Affairs, was pending before the House, I submitted the following remarks, which will be found in exact accord with the sentiments expressed by me not four days ago, in this debate, as follows:

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say simply a word upon the proposition presented to this House by the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Southard]. It seems to me that this subject-matter necessarily and properly pertains to the Committee on Indian Affairs, for the reason that prime among the subjects and objects of that committee is the making provision for taking care of the interests of the Indians. If this was simply a proposition to organize an ordinary Territorial government with a homogeneous American population resident in the Territory, it would be very proper and right and seemly that the Committee on Territories should have exclusive jurisdiction of the subject. But inasmuch as the question of governing the Indians by constructing a Territorial form of government for them is a question sui generis, and not like that referred to by the gentleman from Ohio in regard to organizing a Territory of homogeneous American population with a view to final admission as a State, I think there can be no question as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs over this bill.

It is very well known to the House that in this Indian Territory there are various tribes of Indians, differing in numbers, differing in the legislation which prevails in their respective councils, and differing in their right of representation in their local legislatures. It therefore presents a very peculiar question, and not one such as is ordinarily presented to the consideration of the House upon a proposition to organize a Territorial government upon the showing that a certain Territory possesses the requisite amount of population. The primary question is, whether the government for the Indians should be a government like that to which we would subject an ordinary territory consisting of American citizens; and this is a very different question from that usually presented with reference to the organization of a Territorial government.

This question has been elaborately considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. A very large amount of proof has been taken pro and con. Quite a number of gentlemen distinguished for their fidelity to the Indians—many of them Indians themselves, some of the whole blood and some of the half blood—have been before this committee and have expressed their opinions with reference to the question both orally and in writing. It is well known that a difference of opinion exists among prominent and intelligent men of the Indian tribes themselves and those who thoroughly understand their interests as to the policy of organizing the Indians into a Territorial form of government.

Some conceive that the Indians have arrived at such a point of intelligence with reference to their own affairs and their own interests and the protection of their own rights as to fit them to be organized under a Territorial form of government looking finally to their admission into the Union. But it must be remembered that there are five nations of civilized tribes in this territory, while there are others who can not probably be so classed. All these interests being involved, the question as to their representation in a Territorial government is a subject which properly pertains to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

In answer to the remark of my friend from Ohio [Mr. Southard] that the rules of the House give authority over this subject to the Committee on Territories, and that no rule gives it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, I may very properly say that the other day, when the Committee on Appropriations, presided over with so much ability by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], which seems to draw to itself almost every subject and topic of legislation that can be presented for the consideration of the House—when that committee reported the other day in the general appropriation bill a proposition to transfer the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department they were in my humble judgment trenching upon the functions of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who, though their special duties have not been defined under the rules, have confided to their hands the great question of the interests and management of the Indians and the proper mode of carrying out the faith of the Government as expressed in the treaties with the various Indian tribes. The Committee on Appropriations, I say, undertook to handle that question to the exclusion, in my judgment, of the committee to which it properly pertains.

And now, when a bill has been reported, when proof has been taken and presented to the House, and leave asked that it be printed and recommitted for further consideration, I do not think the House will consent to take this matter from the committee to which properly pertain the management and control of this question and transfer it to the Committee on Territories, whose functions are simply to present bills for the organization of Territories when the population is homogeneous, not when it is sui generis, as is the case with the Indians.

When the Indian Committee shall have passed upon this question, with all the proof it has taken and all the lights before it, it may conclude that a certain form of government ought to exist. But it can not be supposed that an ordinary Territorial form of government would be adapted to the condition, the wants, the necessities, and the respective rights of these various Indian tribes. Why? For the simple and obvious reason that if in the Indian Territory you organize a Territorial government in the ordinary form and manner, the control of that government will in a few years be possessed, necessarily in a large degree, by those who are not Indians. This, in my view, would be the effect of the organization of a Territorial government in the ordinary form for the Indian Territory.

For these reasons I agree with my colleague on the committee in the motion he has made to refer this question to the Committee on Indian Affairs, by whom it has long been considered.

The honorable gentleman from Illinois has alluded in terms of great commendation to the position of Professor Seelye, of New York, who was on the Committee on Indian Affairs at the time when the bill to which the gentleman has referred was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Forty-fourth Congress. Now, what was Mr. Seelye's position in reference to this bill? His views will be found on page 1948 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, as follows:

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Speaker, the question how this Territory shall be organized must of course depend upon the question whether it shall be organized at all, and the question whether it shall be organized at all depends primarily upon the wish of the Indians themselves and upon actual treaty stipulations with these Indians; and if that is not a question which primarily and properly and exclusively belongs to the Indian Commissioner for consideration, I do not know what question does. If it does not, it is about time, I think, the Indian Commissioner was entirely abolished. I demand the previous question.

And the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories, and did refer it back to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It will thus be seen, Mr. Chairman, that when the reference of the bill in the Forty-fourth Congress was up for consideration what were then my views on the rights and interests of the Indians, and what was the best method of protecting them. And it will also be seen that the opinion of Professor Seelye was whether there should be any Territory organized at all, and then if at all upon the wish of the Indians themselves and upon actual treaty stipulation with these Indians.

How different, Mr. Chairman, was the proposition made in the Forty-fourth Congress, and that now pending.

This is a proposition to take one half of the Indian Territory and make of it a Territory to be occupied by white men who shall be required to pay $1.25 an acre for the land. That is what it is, and it is said to be done on the plea that it is for 500,000 landless, homeless people in the United States that you desire to make this Territorial government. In treaties we made we secured the right that they should be admitted as a Territory of their own, not a white man's Territory, but an Indian Territory, in which the Indian should be allowed representatives both in this House and in the other, and so far as the plea is made that there are no lands for occupancy, I will say it was well said by the gentleman from New York in his speech when alluding to the number of acres of public land we still had. He says:

Adding the surveyed undisposed-of lands, 63,000,000, leaves a total of 719,339,332 acres available outside of the Territory of Alaska and the Indian Territory.

So that only an Oklahoma boomer may be apprehensive of the exhaustion of the reservation of the United States in its public lands.

Now, Mr. Chairman, surely the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] did not desire to mislead the committee by saying that this bill now under consideration was in the slightest degree like the bill of 1876 in the Forty-fourth Congress. The one proposes to preserve all the rights, laws, and citizenship of the five semi-civilized tribes, and clothes them alone with the power to vote in said territories, and expressly preserves their tribal organization and tribal laws. This bill proposes to take their land vi et armis, and sell it at a price fixed, not by the owners, the Indians, but fixed by the legal marauders who, under this law, have determined to have this specific land and none other, though there are 700,000,000 acres of public land yet open for occupancy.

The plea that this must be done in the name of the landless and homeless laborers of the country is too shallow and thin to impose on the credulity of the simplest and most uninformed mind.

Sir, this wrong may be perpetrated and one-half of this Territory, so solemnly conveyed to these Indians for their homes forever, converted into a Territory for white men, which means the exclusion and final extinction of the Indians. But it will be a wrong committed by the strong against the weak, which will leave a foul blot on the nation's honor and good name.

Mr. SPRINGER. I simply wanted to remind the gentleman that in the Forty-fourth Congress he was in favor of organizing a government in the Indian Territory. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The question was put, and the Chairman reported that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 65.

Mr. HOOKER. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am afraid we will not be able to get a quorum, and I hope the gentleman will not make this point. Only eleven have voted "ay," and this demand for a quorum can not be for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the House. If the gentleman will withdraw the point of no quorum, I will agree that he may have an ay-and-no vote in the House on his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 19, noes 99.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the roll be called.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the committee having found itself without a quorum, the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Allen, Mass.	Biggs,	Brewer,	Campbell, Ohio
Allen, Mich.	Bingham,	Brower,	Campbell, T. J., N.Y.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had found itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and sixty-six members have answered to their names—more than a quorum, and the committee will resume its session.

The committee accordingly resumed its session, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce the vote at the time the roll was ordered to be called. On the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] there were—ayes 19, noes 99. The tellers will resume their places, and gentlemen who have not voted will please pass between the tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 20, noes 109.

Mr. PAYSON. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that while a technical quorum is here, there is not a voting quorum, and as it is near the time for adjournment, I think it would be wise to rise and adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to accommodate the gentleman. While a quorum will not probably vote upon this proposition we would be required to stay here until 5 o'clock. But it seems to me that as only twenty gentlemen voted for the amendment, the gentleman ought to be satisfied and let the vote which has been taken determine his amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. ROGERS. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PAYSON. Regular order. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not see any necessity of staying here. If gentlemen will proceed with the consideration of the bill, I am ready to go on; but if not, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ROGERS. I will withdraw my motion.

The committee according rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10614, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to telegraph all members who are absent from the city, unless absent on account of sickness of themselves or their families, that their presence here is required immediately in order that the public business may be transacted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. This resolution is for the purpose of procuring the presence of members of the House, and the Speaker the other day decided such a resolution presented a privileged question when the question was up at that time.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make a point of order?

Mr. PAYSON. The question is whether a resolution of this kind could be adopted without first revoking the leaves of absence which have been granted. To telegraph for members who are absent on leave from the House seems to be entirely out of order unless the leaves already granted them should first be revoked. And I make the inquiry whether that should first be done?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certain leaves of absence were revoked, and since that time other gentlemen have been excused. The House has the right to compel the attendance of its members at any time.

Mr. PAYSON. Without revoking the additional leaves?

Mr. SPRINGER. This is not a resolution to arrest the members, but simply a statement that their presence is required.

Mr. PAYSON. I think they ought to be here; but as a preliminary, perhaps the additional leaves ought to be revoked before we go through the empty performance of telegraphing to members.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no penalty attached to this. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that a certain important matter has been set for consideration on Saturday, and it is necessary that the members of the House should be here.

This is simply an earnest request to members who are absent, and whose business will permit their attendance, that they should put in an appearance at as early a time as possible. I think no gentleman ought to object to it, because we have spent half of this day waiting for members to come in to make a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Did not the last roll-call show the presence of a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It did.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then, as a quorum is here, I see no necessity for the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, unless he can couple with it some proposition which will compel members to vote when they are in the Hall.

Mr. SPRINGER. This resolution is not offered with a view of compelling the attendance of members. It does not propose the issue of writs for their arrest; that may become necessary after awhile. This is simply a statement from the House to absent members that, in the condition of our business, their presence here is required.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Illinois be kind enough to refer the Chair to the rule under which he claims that this resolution is privileged?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will do so.

Mr. WHEELER. In the mean time I wish to amend the resolution by substituting the word "requested" for "required."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No amendment can now be entertained. The question of order must first be determined, whether the resolution is privileged and is before the House for consideration.

Mr. CANNON. This is a proposition, I believe, to send telegrams to absent members urging them to come here. That is the motion, I believe?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the substance of it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I wish to ask the Chair and the House what efficacy there will be in sending telegrams to absent members? It has been proclaimed that there is need for immediate legislation to enable us to retaliate against Canada; and the "leader of the House," the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], stated the other day in Chicago, according to the report in the public prints, that "the British lion was to be taken by the snout forthwith." Now, if such an announcement as that will not bring him here, do you suppose that a poor little telegram will do so? I think the sending of telegrams as proposed would be only a useless expense.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Let the expense of the telegrams be charged to the absent members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit that this is a question of privilege.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object, because telegrams were sent members one week ago and when members had answered those telegrams by their presence the very day of their arrival leaves of absence were granted to others. It seems to me to be a futile proceeding to summon members here by telegraph and then at the same time keep on granting leaves of absence.

Mr. WEAVER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this resolution subject to objection? Is not the resolution in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was inclined to think the resolution could not be entertained except by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Illinois, however, said that he would refer the Chair to the rule under which the resolution is in order. Gentlemen will bear in mind the marked distinction between the present case and the condition of business when less than a quorum is endeavoring to secure the attendance of a quorum.

Mr. WEAVER. The Chair can request members to come in from the cloak-room and vote; and certainly the House can request members to come from any part of the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt that the House can do so; but the question is whether this resolution is in order at this time. The rules provide that resolutions shall be referred to committees; and unless there is something that takes this resolution out of that ordinary rule, it is clearly not in order now—not privileged.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Speaker held the other day that a resolution to send telegrams summoning absent members was in order, and also that a resolution revoking leaves of absence was in order.

Mr. CHEADLE. There was no quorum present at that time. We were operating under a call of the House, and the purpose was to secure a quorum.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to yield for a minute or two, in order to allow the passage of a bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have this question disposed of.

Mr. NELSON. This is a bill for the relief of a poor farmer in Minnesota, whose house was burned and who in that way lost four fifty-dollar United States bonds. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to know whether, in the opinion of the Chair, this resolution is privileged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think it is not privileged.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I move a call of the House.

The motion was rejected; there being—ayes 32, noes 63.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 11309) set apart for consideration on Saturday be fixed instead for Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal. There is some doubt of the bill being printed in time.

Mr. DUNN. That is suspension day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the right, under the order of the House, to call it up at any time.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the gentleman has given notice that he will call it up at a particular time.

Mr. McCREARY. I give notice I will call the bill up on Monday next.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the bill had been recommitted, it could have been reported back at any time.

Mr. McCREARY. In order that there shall be no mistake about it, I ask, by unanimous consent, to call the bill up on Monday next.

Mr. DUNN. I object to that, as it is suspension day.

Mr. McCREARY. Does the Chair rule that unanimous consent is necessary?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair thinks the gentleman has the right to call it up on Monday next. Of course the question of consideration can then be raised.

Mr. BLAND. If the bill had been recommitted and the motion to reconsider entered, it could have been called up at any time; but it was postponed until Saturday, and it must be called up on that day unless it is postponed until Monday.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask that the bill be considered on Monday instead of Saturday, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. DUNN. I object to Monday.

Mr. WARNER. We are not in danger from the Canadians in putting it off for one day longer.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I object to Monday, as that is suspension day, and I hope to get in some labor bills.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have had placed in my hand for presentation to the House, by the secretary of the Pennsylvania Auxiliary of the American Peace Society, a memorial praying for such legislation as will lead to the establishment of a system of arbitration, especially between this country and Great Britain, for the settlement of all disputes without a resort to war.

I ask that the memorial, with the names, may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned citizens of Pennsylvania have been appointed—five of them by the governor of the State and five by the Pennsylvania Branch of the American Peace Society—for the purpose of endeavoring to further the adoption by the United States Government of the proposition emanating from over one-third of the members of the British House of Commons for the permanent abandonment of war as a means of settling differences between the two countries.

We need not recount the arguments which have already been addressed to you from different quarters in favor of this measure, nor the evidences derived from scores of successful experiments and covering half a century, that war can be prevented by arbitration whenever a nation is just in its intentions.

In more than half of these cases the United States has been one of the parties and has set a noble example to the rest of the world, which is more and more appreciated and followed as the years pass by. It is eminently fitting that this industrial, commercial, and professedly Christian country should be the pioneer in this movement so becoming the nineteenth century and so consonant with the teachings of the Prince of Peace; and, in our opinion, it is more appropriate that she should take the initiative in the present forward step in favor of a permanent treaty of arbitration than that any other nation should.

It has been urged by way of objection that there is no necessity for this between the United States and the United Kingdom. But two disastrous wars occurred between those nations since the middle of the last century, and there have been at least two narrow escapes from war between them within the last quarter of a century. It is also significant that these were both averted by arbitration.

The fact, however, that there is less likelihood of war between them than between other nations affords the very reason why the present attempt can be made with reasonable hope of success.

It would be most ungracious and would present the appearance of unfriendliness on the part of this country if a proposition, so commendable on general grounds, advocated by so considerable a portion of the British Parliament, a number of whom crossed the ocean as a deputation for the express purpose of presenting it, should be treated with the discourtesy, either of silence or rejection, by a nation between whom and their own exist the strongest ties of kinship and commerce.

We can not conceive that any sane man would prefer war, with all its train of losses, woes, and death, and its unspeakable demoralizations, to a pacific solution of any difficulty that may arise, which would allow the happiness of a great people to remain uninterrupted, the course of commerce to flow on in its accustomed channels, and wealth and population to increase, unchecked by wanton waste and destruction.

For these reasons, fortified by the experience of the past and enforced by our hopes of the future prosperity of this country, we cordially support the proposition of the British deputation and entreat Congress to pass a joint resolution instructing our Government to negotiate with the Government of Great Britain a treaty providing for the settling by arbitration of all differences whatever between the two countries which fail to reach a satisfactory solution through the ordinary channels of diplomacy, to the end that all disastrous effusion of blood by wars between these kindred nations shall hereafter forever be avoided.

Joshua L. Baily, Robt. E. Pattison, Jno. Wanamaker, Chas. H. Janes, David Scull, committee appointed by the governor of Pennsylvania. Philip C. Garrett, George Dana Boardman, Richard Wood, T. P. Stevenson, W. F. Sadler (president), committee appointed by the Pennsylvania Auxiliary of the American Peace Society. I am in sympathy with the movement above referred to: James A. Beaver. We cordially unite in the foregoing petition: Jas. Pollock, J. F. Hartranft, Henry M. Hoyt, ex-governors of Pennsylvania; Edwin H. Fitler, mayor of Philadelphia; Daniel M. Fox, W. S. Stokley, Samuel G. King, ex-mayors of Philadelphia; John Cadwalader, collector of the port; George S. Graham, district attorney; Louis Wagner, director of public works; Robert P. PHILADELPHIA, June 30, 1888.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Oklahoma bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask for general leave to members to print remarks on the Oklahoma bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. NELSON. I ask to consider a bill to which there will be no objection.

Mr. KILGORE. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I give notice that I will not call up the Oklahoma bill to-morrow.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. BUTLER: A bill (H. R. 11310) for the relief Captain Plesant Williams—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MOFFITT: A bill (H. R. 11311) granting a pension to James Metcalf—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. C. A. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 11312) granting an increase of pension to Gifford M. Bridge—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSHEND: A bill (H. R. 11313) for the relief of James K. Rainey—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11314) for the relief of Elison Colman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 11315) for the relief of Susan Slatton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TURNER: A bill (H. R. 11316) granting a pension to Charlotte Ayres—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. C. R. BRECKINRIDGE: Petition of citizens of Woodruff County, Arkansas, for amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. COMPTON: Petition of Bernhard Buscher, and of estate of Henry Stello, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. R. H. M. DAVIDSON: Resolution of provisional municipality of Pensacola, Fla., in reference to the yellow fever in Florida—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MCKINLEY: Petition of F. B. Hinson and others, for a land district in Northern New Mexico—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. O'FERRALL: Petition of Lewis F. Moreland, heir of Samuel Moreland, of Clarke County, Virginia, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. OUTHWAITE: Petition of E. F. Redfern and others, in favor of granting pension to Norah Lohr—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN: Petition of Peter L. Feeger, of Tipton County, Tennessee, for reference of his war claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SNYDER: Remonstrance of William A. Quarrier and others, citizens of West Virginia, against the passage of Senate bill No. 3234—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WHEELER: Petition of William Gullatt, of Jackson County, Alabama, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

The following petition, indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. C. S. BAKER: Of H. G. Thayer and 44 others, citizens of Monroe County, New York.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 31, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a petition of the Tacoma Bar Association, of the city of Tacoma, Wash., praying for the creation of two additional judicial districts in that Territory, and providing judges therefor; also a similar petition signed by members of the bar generally of Pierce County, Washington Territory. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN presented the petition of W. E. Bonner and 25 other citizens of Freestone County, Texas, praying that increased compensation be allowed fourth-class postmasters; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 10122) granting a pension to Margaret Quinton;

A bill (H. R. 7912) for the relief of Frances P. Vernon;

A bill (H. R. 2716) granting a pension to J. W. Leight;

A bill (H. R. 10738) to increase the pension of George C. Quick;

A bill (H. R. 10241) increasing the pension of Richard Porter;

A bill (H. R. 10907) granting a pension to Henry Mitchell Youngblood; and

A bill (H. R. 6309) for the relief of Mary A. Covey.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9557) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Longshaw, dependent mother of William Longshaw, late assistant surgeon United States Navy, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5193) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin Franklin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9358) to increase the pension of Rosalie O'Sullivan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2766) for the relief of Maj. James Belger; and

A bill (S. 2055) for the relief of Mrs. Catherine E. Whitall.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 979) for the relief of Benjamin D. Lakin, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3467) to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases from one State to another, and for the punishment of certain offenses, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. DANIEL to the general deficiency appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon; and the amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1892) for the relief of soldiers who have been honorably mustered out of the service of the United States Government on surgeons' certificates, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government," to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length.

Mr. HOAR. For information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1888, entitled a 'Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government,'" approved July 31, 1888, be and the same are hereby extended and continued in full force and effect to and including the 15th day of September, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. FARWELL introduced a bill (S. 3505) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CAMERON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN COLUMBIA COUNTY, FLORIDA.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 239) confirming titles to certain lands in Columbia County, State of Florida, which was reported adversely by the Committee on Public Lands on the 27th instant and indefinitely postponed, may be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order by which the bill was postponed indefinitely will be reconsidered, if there be no objection, and the bill placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

TRANSIT OF GOODS IN BOND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. CULLOM August 30, 1888, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States in his message of August 23, 1888, concerning our relations with Canada advises Congress that Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington, which provided for the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond over the territory of the United States to or from Canada is no longer in force; and

Whereas in the same message the President also advises Congress that section 3 of the act of March 1, 1873, passed to carry into effect the provisions of said Article XXIX is no longer in force; and

Whereas section 3005 of the Revised Statutes only authorizes the transit through the territory of the United States of merchandise destined for Canada and arriving from abroad at New York, Boston, and Portland in Maine (or at such other ports as may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury): Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the transit in bond over or across the territory of the United States, without the payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise coming from Canada has been permitted since July 1, 1885, when Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington, and section 3 of the act of March 1, 1873, are said to have ceased to be in force; and, if so, to what extent and by what authority of law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think the resolution is unnecessary. There are statutory provisions which have been in force since 1862 and 1864 under which exportations from Canada to the United States have been exported to foreign countries. In other words, at the time of the ratification of the treaty of 1871 all the operations of commerce which are permitted by Article XXIX of that treaty were permitted and in force and in vogue and constantly practiced under the then existing statutes of the United States.

On June 7, 1864, an act was passed which is now incorporated in the Revised Statutes as section 3102, by which when goods arriving at a port in the United States were destined to a port not on the sea or destined to any port different from the port into which the importation was first made, they could be carried under bond or in sealed cars to the port of destination. Under section 3102 goods arriving from Canada at any of the ports in the United States on the Lakes or on the line between Canada and the United States, by being in sealed cars or under bond could be transported without payment of duties, without examination by the custom-house officers and without breaking package, to New York, or Boston, or Portland in Maine, or any other port in the United States.

When the importation from Canada arrived, for instance, in New York, by another statute passed on the 14th day of July, 1862, and which is now incorporated in section 2971 of the Revised Statutes, the goods thus arriving and thus being transported to New York could be immediately re-exported to any other country without the payment of duties, without the breaking of bulk, without any detention whatever other than such detention as was necessary to transact the business at the custom-house by which a clearance for the goods could be had.

So section 3005 of the Revised Statutes only applied to importations from foreign countries destined for Canada, and only regulated the transit that way, because at that very time the two statutes to which I have referred were in force, which allowed this duplex operation of first transferring the goods from the port of entry on the Canadian frontier to another port on the Atlantic, and the operation of section 3102 which allowed goods imported into the United States to be exported at any time within three years, and they could immediately be exported. It was under that duplex operation that exports from Canada from the year 1864 were constantly transported across the territory of the United States for foreign countries, and it was not the reverse operation. The transfer of goods arriving from foreign countries and destined for Canada was not provided for until 1866, two years after the former act went into operation.

When that act was passed the matter stood in this way: Under the operations of the laws of the United States, section 2971 and its cognate sections and section 3102, all goods which the Canadians wished to export from their country to Europe or elsewhere could come through the United States without the payment of duty, without examination, without breaking package, or without any other trouble than getting an entrance at the custom-house in the port from which they were exported. The goods went out under section 3102 as imports which the importer did not wish to consume here, but wished to re-export.

When Congress came to act in 1866 as to the reverse operation they recognized what was well known, and what was the practice of the Treasury Department at the time, and they provided alone for the reverse operation, or the transfer of imported goods from Europe or other countries through the United States to Canada.

So there is the authority, plain, practiced on for nearly a quarter of a century, for the operation about which the resolution of the Senator from Illinois makes inquiry.

While I am up I wish to refer to a matter which I omitted yesterday, which is cognate to this subject and pertinent to it. I omitted to state yesterday that whilst under these two combined operations, under section 2871 of the Revised Statutes and section 3102 of the Revised Statutes, to get goods from Canada through the United States to a foreign country, as there has to be a distinct importation into the United States with but a short rest here, coming in as an importation, there does exist—and I hope the President, if the Senate will not give him the power that he asks for, will exercise that power—there does exist in the President a power under the act of 1887 which authorizes him to prevent the coming of any goods into the United States from Canada. He may under that power prevent that operation. Under that statute the transfer of goods from Canada to foreign countries by this duplex operation, first as an import, and then as an export of an import, may be prevented by the President, though he can not under section 3005 prevent the other operation; that is, the transfer under the authority of that statute of foreign goods coming into the United States by transit and destined for Canada.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say this morning that I introduced the resolution in perfect good faith for the purpose of getting information and with no captious spirit whatever. In view of the suggestions of the Senator from Mississippi as to sections of the law to which I did not have my attention called, I will ask that the resolution lie over until to-morrow morning, and if I find that it is covered by the statutes, as the Senator states, I shall then allow the resolution to go to the appropriate committee or to be disposed of in some other way.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is proper. I have no doubt the Senator will find the case to be exactly as I stated it.

Mr. VEST. I was not in the Senate yesterday. I understood the Senator from Illinois to state day before yesterday that he intended to leave the city.

Mr. CULLOM. No; I did not expect to leave, and I do not remember that I said so.

Mr. VEST. I had intended to address the Senate upon the question of the President's message lately sent to this body, but my health has been such for two days that I do not feel able to enter at length into the discussion, unless the exigencies of the business of the Senate demand it. But I see in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, in the remarks of the Senator from Illinois, the following statement:

This Administration has been from first to last one of sham and pretense. It has made a pretense of economy, but has been the most extravagant one we have ever had for very many years. It has made a pretense of favoring civil-service reform, while there never has been one that so utterly disregarded it, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the chairman of the select committee on that subject, has shown by his statements here and by discussions which have taken place. I have in my hand a newspaper, which I shall not take up the time of the Senate to read, but which gives an account of civil-service reform in the great city of Chicago, in my own State, in connection with the post-office there, where the law partner of the postmaster put a card upon his door and sent cards to the various employés, telling them to come over and see him, and the account says that the ante-room of that distinguished lawyer, the partner of the postmaster at Chicago, was full of people knocking at the door to get in to make the contributions, so that they might not lose their places.

If the postmaster at the city of Chicago, an appointee of this Administration, has prostituted his office, violated his oath, trampled upon the rules of the civil service by collusion with his law partner—if he has through his law partner emulated the example which the Republican party set to the country for so many years, and if he has indirectly sought to evade a plain statute, then that official should be put out of office and should receive the condemnation of every honest man, for he has violated his duty, he has violated the law, and I undertake to say that it would receive the condemnation of the President of the United States and those now in authority.

But when the Senator from Illinois, in his capacity as a Senator, speaks of civil service reform in his own State, and goes out of the way in a legitimate discussion upon a great international question to assail his political opponents, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate and the country the record which I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., July 17, 1883.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to introduce to you Hon. E. E. Cowperthwait, whom you have just appointed. He has been compelled to remain at home a few days to get his business in shape. Mr. Cowperthwait is a member of our State Legislature and a man of very considerable political influence in the State. I shall be very grateful to you for any special favor you may be able to extend to him, as it will be of political use to have him in the State, if it can be so arranged, after he gets familiar with the work.

I am very grateful to you for the interest you have taken in securing the position. Hope I shall be able to return favors some of these days.

Truly yours,

S. M. CULLOM.

General W. W. DUDLEY,
Commissioner of Pensions.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., September 15, 1884.

DEAR FRIEND: Our campaign is beginning to get warm. We need our forces. Can you give E. E. Cowperthwait, one of your special examiners, now in Missouri, a leave of absence for a month to come home and help in the campaign? He is a good speaker and a man of influence. He is a poor man, and I hope he can have leave with pay.

Yours,

S. M. CULLOM.

General W. W. DUDLEY,
Commissioner of Pensions.

SPECIAL EXAMINER'S DIVISION, January 8, 1886.

Mr. E. E. Cowperthwait was granted leave of twenty-three days, with pay, from October 6, and nine days, without pay, from October 29, 1884.

Mr. C. was appointed July 18, 1884, from Illinois.

A. S. COLEMAN, Chief.

Mr. VEST. I simply wish to add that I understand the elementary and first principles of the civil-service reform movement to be that the public officers of the country and the time of the public officers shall not be prostituted to political purposes by any official of the Government. If this gentleman could be taken from his duties in the Pension Office and his pay continued whilst he did campaign work in the State of Illinois, then it seems to me a striking commentary upon the attack made yesterday upon the Democratic party in regard to the civil service in that State, and made now by the distinguished Senator whose name is appended to those dispatches or letters.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from what book he had the Secretary read?

Mr. VEST. He read from the campaign book of the Democratic party, which purports to take those letters from the records of the Pension Office. The Secretary may read the heading of the document, if necessary.

Mr. CULLOM. I know what the document is. It used to sell at a dollar a copy, I believe.

Mr. VEST. I do not know what it sold at.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as the letters are concerned which the honorable Senator has had read, purporting to be signed by myself, I have simply to say that I did write letters—I am not aware whether these are correct copies or not—to the Commissioner of Pensions, asking that the gentleman named be allowed a leave of absence to go home, and probably I said something about the campaign, and I probably said something about the gentleman having a leave of absence with pay, understanding as I did and do now, that employés of the Government are entitled, either by law or regulation, I am not sure which, to a given leave of absence, which is thirty days, I believe.

Mr. PLUMB. Thirty days, with pay.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether that is the law or a regulation.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is the law.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not fully aware, but I have always understood that to be the actual condition of affairs connected with the Government. That is all I have to say about those letters.

So far as my charge against the Administration of the violation of the civil-service law is concerned, as the Senator from Missouri has seen proper to call up what I said in regard to the Chicago post-office, I ask the Secretary to read a report of what took place in connection with the lawyer, a partner of the postmaster, who asked the employés of that post-office to come over to see him, so that we may know all about the whole situation.

Mr. COCKRELL. From what is the Secretary to read?

Mr. CULLOM. It is from the Chicago Tribune. The Secretary will please read what I have indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Chicago Tribune, Wednesday, August 22, 1888.]

"COME OVER AND SEE ME"—A PRESSING INVITATION EXTENDED TO POST-OFFICE EMPLOYÉS—THEY RECEIVE A POSTAL CARD FROM MR. E. P. ESHER, OF THE FIRM OF JUDD, RITCHIE & ESHER, AND WHEN THEY CALL ARE ASKED TO DONATE FROM $10 TO $25 TO THE DEMOCRATIC CAMPAIGN FUND—WHAT MR. JUDD SAYS ABOUT IT.

During the last few days nearly everybody connected with the post-office received a postal-card to this effect:

"DEAR SIR: Please call and see me at your early convenience on a matter of importance.

"E. B. ESHER,
"Room 38, Ashland Block."

Now, what was this matter of importance? A young man started out to penetrate the mystery. He went to Room 38 Ashland Block. Upon the door was neatly printed:

"Judd, Ritchie & Esher, law office."

"Judd, Ritchie & Esher," mused the young man. "Why, that is Postmaster Judd's law firm. That's funny." Then he went in and asked for Mr. Esher.

"That is my name," said the gentleman addressed, at the same time laying down his newspaper. Motioning the young man to a vacant chair he inquired the nature of his business.

"I was told you wanted to see me," said the newcomer; "my name is Holland."

"Who told you?" asked Mr. Esher, eying the innocent looking stranger somewhat suspiciously.

"Ed Robinson."

"Who's Ed Robinson?"

"He works over at the post-office."

"Do you work there too?"

"Yes, sir."

"In what department?"

"The Western mail room."

Mr. Esher took out a roll of manuscript and appeared for a moment to be searching for the name of his visitor. Finding the search tedious and fruitless he looked up from his desk and eyed the stranger in a manner that witnesses subject to the legal gentleman's cross-examination have had great reason to dread.

"I don't find your name here," he said abruptly. "Who is your superior?"

"Mr. Wilbanks," replied the young man, growing somewhat nervous under the inquisition.

"Where's your card?" demanded the attorney sharply.

"Card!" repeated the young man blankly, "I don't—that is—er—I have not got any printed cards—I mean to say"——

The attorney kindly came to the assistance of his evidently embarrassed visitor, and, dropping his stern "nisi prius" demeanor, he assumed a look in which patronage and kindness seemed to bubble forth from his every feature.

"Never mind. If you did not receive a card—a postal card, I mean—you will do so. Now that you are here, however, I may as well tell you what I wanted you for. How much will you subscribe toward the Democratic national campaign fund?"

He stammered something about not being able to do much, but supposed he would have to come in with the rest.

FIXING THE PERCENTAGE.

"Let me see; what is your salary?" Mr. Esher inquired, perceiving the young man's hesitation.

"Only $75 a month, but"——

"Ah—I see—a good contribution," broke in Esher gleefully. "Let me see—$75—shall we say $25? Yes, I think $25 will about be satisfactory for a young man in your position."

At the same time he produced a book wherein a long string of names of contributors were inscribed, against each of which was set forth the amount promised. The majority had inscribed $10, but many had named $15 as their limit. Perceiving that Holland was inspecting the list somewhat curiously, Mr. Esher hastened to explain that none of the signatures on that list were in as good a position as $75 a month.

"I must tell you, Mr. Holland—I think you said that was your name—that the least you should give is $25."

"But I have a wife and family," began the young man, apologetically, "and, besides, as I am just going to housekeeping, $25 is a big sum out of one month's money. By the way, when has this money to be paid?"

"It should be paid by the 1st of September, but in your case I think we may call it the 16th; and suppose we say $20 instead of $25, how will that suit?"

The visitor meekly acknowledged the condescension of his pseudo chief's partner, and, appearing to become bold by the graciousness of the attorney, ventured to suggest $15 as the limit to which his housekeeping fund should be taxed for the benefit of the present Administration.

"All right, we will call it $15, but do not tell any of the boys that you only gave so little. Sign your name in this book and just say 'Payable by September 16.'"

Thus requested, the young man nervously seized the proffered pencil and signed "J. P. Holland. Payable on or before September 16, $15."

"I remember your name now," said Mr. Esher, as he took the pen. "I recollect sending you a notice to come and see me. You'll get it all right." Then he bade the young man good-day.

MR. ESHER SADLY PERPLEXED—A SECOND CALL FROM THE YOUNG MAN WORRIES HIM.

Something like an hour later the same young man called again at the law office where Postmaster Judd is the principal partner. He asked for Mr. Esher.

"Mr. Esher is busy," said a tall, funereal looking clerk in reply to the reporter's inquiries.

A glimpse through the half-opened door of Mr. Esher's private office disclosed that gentleman seated at his desk expounding the law in its dual relationship to civil-service reform and Democratic success to a couple of letter-carriers. His arguments seemed to be as brief and just as directly to the point as they had been when he was inculcating to "Ed. Robinson's" friend the necessity of planking down the cold dollars for the good of the cause. His hearers in this case, however, seemed to have a great deal more to say. Their voices could be heard considerably above a mild whisper, and it sounded to the outsider much as though there was a kick being made.

Suddenly there was a silence, a scraping of chairs as of some one drawing up to a desk to sign his name, and an instant later the two letter-carriers appeared in the doorway of the office. Their flushed faces and far from enthusiastic looks plainly told that the interview had not been a pleasant one, and that they were glad it was over.

"Mr. Esher is disengaged now," said the funereal youth.

MR. ESHER IS SURPRISED.

Entering the office the young man handed to Mr. Esher his card:

"J. P. Holland, Chicago Tribune."

The lawyer motioned to his visitor to take a chair, at the same time bending over his desk to read the inscription on the card.

As he did so his hand mechanically sought the open subscription book which lay on the desk, and before he had taken his eye from the offending pasteboard the tell-tale book had been doubled up in the hand furthest from where the reporter sat.

"What can I do for you, sir?" said the lawyer at length, looking up.

"The Tribune would like to know something about the Democratic campaign fund," the reporter began, when suddenly the look of horrified perplexity which began to creep over the lawyer's face caused him to stop.

Perplexity, anxiety, indignation, dismay, and horror succeeded each other with lightning rapidity in the expression of the attorney's mobile features.

"The Tribune?—er—I don't understand," he stammered, whenever the reporter repeated the query for information.

"Impossible!" muttered the attorney sotto voce; "it can not be—but yet——" and the remainder of his thoughts expended themselves in the region of his astonished brain.

"Well, sir," suddenly drawing himself up and facing the reporter with an expression in which could be read a determination to be as candid and outspoken as a deaf mute oyster, "what can I do for you?"

"The Tribune would like to know something about the Democratic campaign fund," repeated the reporter for the third time.

Again the look of agonized perplexity crept into the lawyer's face, and, spite of his evident intention to show a bold front, he replied:

"Haven't I seen you somewhere before?"

"Yes, sir—about an hour ago."

"Chicago Tribune!" the puzzled lawyer repeated to himself, taking up the card which had been lying before him. "Where did I see you?"

"Right here."

"But how can that be—didn't you bring me a card?"

"No, sir; I didn't have one to bring."

"Strange!" he replied, as if trying to recall the incidents of the interview with the reporter.

"'Ed Robinson' sent me, you remember," suggested the latter, noting the perplexity of his interlocutor.

"Oh, I see; you work at the post-office. Ah! that's different," as though a load of care had suddenly been taken off his mind.

"No, sir; I work at the Tribune office," responded the reporter.

MR. ESHER LOCKS THE DOOR.

The incipient smile vanished, and the astonished lawyer rose to his feet and walked towards the office door.

Turning the key in the lock, he resumed his seat, and ran his fingers through his hair, as if trying mentally to grasp the situation before he proceeded further.

Soon the ludicrous side presented itself, and he faced around, smiling, to his visitor, to whom he extended his hand.

"Very clever, very clever, indeed. Now, what are you going to do about it?"

"Just as you say. All I want is information," the reporter replied, grasping the outstretched hand. "First of all, how about that $15 subscription?"

"That was hardly fair. You see I have already remitted that money, or, at least, made myself liable for it."

"How so?"

"I have checked it off as paid—see," showing the book in which the reporter's signature was already succeeded by a number of other signatures for similar or less amounts. "By checking it off as paid I made myself liable to the national committee for that amount, and unless some one pays it I shall be just so much out of pocket."

"Isn't this a pretty steep sum for a poor fellow only earning $75 a month, with a wife and family to support and just going to house-keeping?"

"Not very—at least as compared with the assessments paid under a Republican administration."

"What was the rate of Republican assessments?" inquired the reporter.

"Much higher, I assure you. I should say, however, that this is not an assessment," the lawyer explained.

SUBSCRIBERS TO THE FUND—THE AUTHORITY MR. ESHER HAS TO ACT AS COLLECTOR.

"To whom were the postal-cards sent?"

"To everybody likely to contribute—Government employés and others."

"Would you mind showing me one of the postal-cards?"

"What good would it do you?"

"My object is to learn if there is anything of the 'stand and deliver' about the message which the letter-carriers seem so reluctant to answer."

"Nothing of the kind—there's no reluctance on their part—they come willingly. I can give you the names of several who have called here, but whom I have sent away without obtaining their signature because I didn't think they could afford anything."

Mr. Esher fumbled among the pile of postal-cards as he spoke and presently drew forth one from the heap. Holding it flat in his outstretched palm so that the edges alone could be seen by the reporter, he continued:

"This young fellow is a lad of sixteen. He came up here and would have signed his name for $10 willingly, but I told him to ask his father before doing so."

"What was the boy's salary?"

"I don't remember," replacing the card and throwing a blotting-pad over the pile.

"We have several instances of the kind—young men of seventeen or eighteen who want to subscribe, but whom I send away to get their parents' consent."

"Did any of them come back yet?"

"Not yet—at least not to my recollection."

"About how much does each man subscribe?" asked the reporter, the memory of that $15 still rankling in his mind. "Do they all prove as generous as reporters?"

"I would rather be excused from answering that question. You see, it would have a bad effect on future subscriptions."

"But can't you give me an idea—was I generous or niggardly?"

"If the truth must be told," the lawyer answered pleasantly, "you were rather above the average."

"What would you call the average, then?"

"About 1 per cent. for the lower-priced men, and rather more for those earning larger salaries."

HE IS NOT EMPLOYED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

"Are you in any way employed by the Government, Mr. Esher?"

"Most emphatically no. My authority in the matter emanates directly from the Democratic national committee."

To prove the truth of his assertion Mr. Esher produced the book in which the reporter had written his name. A hasty glance at its pages as they were being turned over enabled the reporter to estimate the number of subscribers who had pledged themselves. The book is about thirty-six leaves thick and each page contains about twenty lines. As nearly as could be judged the book is about a third filled with names, which would give somewhere in the neighborhood of five hundred signatures.

On the inside of the front cover is the following:

"Mr. Edward B. Esher is duly authorized to collect subscriptions for the Democratic national campaign fund.

"ERSKINE M. PHELPS,
"Member of the Democratic National Committee."

"There you see my authority," exclaimed the attorney.

"But how came the national committee to select you as collector?" queried the reporter.

"I don't know—indeed I may admit that I was surprised when I learned of the appointment."

MR. JUDD'S POSITION.

"Did Mr. Judd tell you?"

"No, sir," indignantly. "In this connection Mr. Judd has no more to do with me than you have, in fact hardly as much. Ask him and you will find the facts to be just as I have stated."

"But if Mr. Judd did not actually inform you of the appointment does it not look as though the fact of your position as his law partner may have had something to do with it?"

"Not in the least."

"Don't the men feel that in answering your politely emphatic postal-card they would take their life or their job in their hands by refusing?"

"Not in the least. They come willingly, and I tell each one of them immediately he enters this office, before I mention subscription, that what I am about to say does not affect his position in any way, and that his refusal to subscribe, should he feel so inclined, will in no event be considered against him in relation to his work."

The earnestness of this declaration, delivered with a force of eloquence such as no "twelve men good and true" could have withstood, would have carried conviction even to the skeptical reporter's mind had he not suddenly remembered a little incident earlier in the afternoon, wherein a "young man with a wife and family, about to go to housekeeping," had been held up, and this polite introduction of the subject omitted.

Ignoring the discrepancy as likely to lead off the subject of Mr. Judd's connection with the fund, he asked:

"Does Mr. Judd know of this collection being made in his office?"

"This is not his office; it is my office," answered the wary lawyer.

"Well, does he know of the collection being taken up in your office, then?"

"I suppose so, but, I repeat, he has nothing whatever to do with it. I act directly for the national committee. I don't know who suggested my name to them. I only returned from Europe this summer, and on my return I was informed that I had been selected."

"I suppose, then, Mr. Judd would not countenance the collection did he know that the fact of his name being associated with yours in business acted as a sort of compulsion on the men?"

"Of course he would not."

A POINT HE HAD STUDIED—MR. ESHER COULDN'T BE CAUGHT BY CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

Changing the subject, as further questions on this point only promised to bring out further denials of the postmaster's complicity, tacit or expressed, in the matter, the reporter inquired:

"How about the civil-service act? Is this not a direct violation of it?"

The question seemed to please the lawyer hugely. He had evidently been expecting it all through the unwilling cross-examination to which he had found himself in a measure compelled to act the part of candid witness. Smiling benignantly on the legally untutored scribe, he answered:

"I had studied that law thoroughly before I undertook any part in this matter, and I would suggest that you do the same."

The abashed reporter acknowledged his ignorance on the subject from a strictly legal standpoint, and suggested that it would be well to enlighten the public how the act could be so narrowly skimmed and yet successfully evaded.

"If you will consult the act you will find that it prohibits the collection of funds for party purposes from Government employés on two conditions. First, the funds must be collected inside a Government building; and, secondly, the party making the collection must be a Government official.

"Now you can clearly see," he continued, "that this is not a Government office. I pay rent for this place, and the Government has no more to do with it than you have; so far I am not breaking the law. Secondly, I am not a Government official. I was employed at the post-office until last spring, but since then I have found my legal practice all I could manage, so I gave up my Government position. If you can find any clause in the act which will bring me under its penal provisions I would like to hear about it.

"Mr. Phelps also is as free of Government fetters as I am, and I fail to see how the act reaches him."

"But Mr. Judd—he can hardly be said to be outside the prohibited circle," the reporter suggested.

"I have already told you a dozen times that Mr. Judd has nothing whatever to do with this fund," answered the lawyer in tones of vexation.

THINGS HE WOULD LIKE LEFT OUT.

Quickly changing the tone and theme of the conversation, Mr. Esher reverted to the scheme whereby he had given the whole business away to the reporter. "After all," he continued, "I don't think it was hardly the square thing for you to do—coming to me as you did, telling me the yarn about 'Ed Robinson' Now, as a favor to me I would ask you not to say anything about that interview. I would have been ready to give the Tribune all the information I have given you, and there's no use giving me away."

As the reporter failed to respond with becoming alacrity to Mr. Esher's request to kill a good story, the gentleman redoubled his taffy.

"Will you promise me one thing, like a good fellow?" the lawyer entreated.

"If it be in my power, certainly."

"Well, as a personal favor, I ask you not to write anything of the scheme you put up on me to get this information."

The reporter's memory instantly reverted to the fact that the "copy" of the first interview had been prepared before the second visit.

"I won't write a single line on the subject."

"Thank you very much," replied the gratified lawyer, unlocking the door and bowing the reporter out.

THEY WERE WAITING TO SEE HIM.

The ante-room was by this time filled with letter-carriers and others waiting patiently, and the looks of pitiful inquiry which met the reporter on emerging from the sanctum were not the strongest possible confirmation of the alleged willingness which Mr. Esher had expatiated so largely upon.

Two weary-looking carriers rose at once to face the music of the inner room, but before they could enter Mr. Esher appeared in the doorway and beckoned his funereal lieutenant to a confab on the aspect of affairs.

At the elevator the reporter met two more letter-carriers hurrying like snails to their chief's office.

Entering the elevator on its upward journey, he engaged in conversation with the boy in charge.

"Lots of letter-carriers in this building," he observed.

"'Pears so—guess dar mus' be sum'fin' like a lawsuit agin de Guv'nment—dey's comin' heah a week or mo' now—guess dar's som'fin' upsettin' 'em—dey all looks black'n'er thunder an' goes off wuss'n'r dey come."

"How many of them do you think there have been?"

"I dunno. Mus' ha' been hundreds—comin' an' goin' all de time—'pears like s'f dar's gwine ter be a strike or sum'fin er de sort—nebber seed sich a lot of mad lookin' pos'men—shuah."

Thanking the darkey for the information, the reporter left the building.

A TALK WITH MR. JUDD—OF COURSE HE KNOWS NOTHING OF THE ASSESSMENT OF POST-OFFICE PEOPLE.

Seated in the pleasant back parlor of his well-appointed residence last evening, Postmaster Judd discussed the civil-service law with a Tribune reporter.

"What is your opinion," he was asked, "of the rule respecting the levying or soliciting of subscriptions for campaign purposes by Government employés of their subordinates?"

"I think the rule is all right."

"Supposing you should discover that one of your heads of departments was levying such subscriptions for the benefit of the present Democratic campaign?"

"His head would come off instanter."

"You intend, then, that the rule shall be observed to the letter in the Chicago post-office?"

"Most assuredly."

"Do you think this rule is understood by your heads of departments?"

"I have taken pains that it should be, and I have no doubt it is."

"And that they understand the nature of the penalty provided for those who violate it?"

"I do not think there is any question about it."

"Well, then, how do you account for the fact that nearly every subordinate in your employ is in receipt of a postal-card requesting him to call at a certain place, and that when he calls there he is urged to subscribe out of his next month's salary from $10 to $25?"

"I do not know anything about such postal-cards, nor such demands on my employés. If I should find that they existed and emanated from any one connected with the Chicago post-office, I should see that the rule was enforced without delay."

"These cards were signed 'E. B. Esher,' and the recipient was requested to call at room 38, Ashland Block."

"Well?"

"Room 38 is the law office of E. B. Esher, and when an employé of the post-office appeared in answer to the card he had received, Mr. Esher at once asked him how much he was willing to subscribe toward the Democratic campaign fund. If the employé's salary was $75 a month or over, he was urged to put down his name in a book for $25. If he demurred at that he was let off with $10 or $15."

"Well?"

"Mr. Esher has two partners—the firm name is Judd, Ritchie & Esher. You are one of the firm, are you not?"

"No, hardly," said Mr. Judd, as he arranged his chin more comfortably in his high starched collar. "I can hardly be said to be a partner, though my name still stands with the others. I gave up my law practice when I was appointed postmaster. They wished my name to remain in that of the firm, and it was so arranged. Mr. Esher occasionally consults me on certain questions of practice, and that is all the connection I have with the firm."

"Why should Mr. Esher send such cards to employés of the post-office?"

"I suppose that if he wishes to solicit money for campaign purposes he may choose his own means of so doing. I know of no law that prohibits Mr. Esher or any one else not in the employ of the Government soliciting such subscriptions from post-office employés as well as from other citizens."

"But why should he inquire of them in what department they are employed, what salaries they receive, and urge them to put their names down for such comparatively large sums?"

"As to that I know nothing. I was aware that Mr. Esher was interested somehow in the work of some campaign committee, but I had learned nothing about the details. He is a thoroughly honorable man, however, and would not identify himself with questionable methods."

"You are of the opinion, then, that no one in the post-office could levy contributions on the employés through Mr. Esher?"

"Perfectly sure. Nobody could make a tool of Esher."

Mr. Judd said he had subscribed to the campaign fund voluntarily, and he had no doubt many of the post-office employés had done or would do so. That was their own affair. He believed that most of them were aware that they could not be forced to do so on pain of losing their situations. If he found any attempt of the kind being made the offender should be brought to justice without delay.

THE LAW ON POLITICAL ASSESSMENTS—WHAT THE UNITED STATES STATUTE HAS TO SAY ON THE SUBJECT.

In reference to assessments of Government employés for political purposes, chapter 27 of the United States Statutes, entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," says:

"SEC. 11. That no Senator, no Representative, or Territorial Delegate of the Congress, or Senator, Representative, or Delegate elect, or any officer or employé of either of said Houses, and no executive, judicial, military, or naval officer of the United States, and no clerk or employé of any department, branch, or bureau of the executive, judicial, military, or naval service of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive, or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving, any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever, from any officer, clerk, or employé of the United States, or any department, branch, or bureau thereof, or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from money derived from the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 12. That no person shall in any room or building occupied in the discharge of official duties by any officer or employé of the United States mentioned in this act, or in any navy-yard, fort, or arsenal, solicit in any manner whatever or receive any contribution of money or any other thing of value for any political purpose whatever.

"SEC. 13. No officer or employé of the United States mentioned in this act shall discharge, or promote, or degrade, or in any manner change the official rank or compensation of any other officer or employé, or promise or threaten so to do, for giving or withholding or neglecting to make any contribution of money or other valuable thing for any political purpose.

"SEC. 14. That no officer, clerk, or other person in the service of the United States shall, directly or indirectly, give or hand over to any other officer, clerk, or person in the service of the United States, or to any Senator, or member of the House of Representatives, or Territorial Delegate, any money or other valuable thing on account of or to be applied to the promotion of any political object whatever.

"SEC. 15. That any person who shall be guilty of violating any provision of the four foregoing sections shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by such fine and imprisonment both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. CULLOM. I have had that read for the purpose of showing that this man is acting under the orders of the Democratic national committee, collecting money for national campaign purposes, and evidently he was selected for the purpose of calling upon the Post-Office employés, as he had a list of them, as is shown there, for examination so that he might notify each man, as he seems to have done. That is all I have to say about that.

I desire to say further that as far as the Republican party is concerned it has never believed in muzzling anybody's mouth in giving expression to his political views, whether he might be in the employ of the Government or not; and that if a man in the employ of the Government desires to talk or to make speeches in a campaign the Republican party does not deny him that privilege.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment? I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to the fact that this gentleman who was granted leave of absence was granted twenty-three days' leave with pay and nine days' leave without pay, showing, of course, that he was taking simply his ordinary thirty days' leave, which the law authorizes every clerk in every Department of this Government to take in each year.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to say that the essential feature of civil-service reform was that public office, in the language of his chief, is a public trust, and that the time of the officer should be given to that public trust and not to political or partisan work. Apropos to this, I call his attention, not to any old matters which I have hunted up in old reports, but to a modern instance. The New York Tribune of August 18, less than two weeks ago, is responsible for a statement which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MR. TRAINER DRAWS FEDERAL PAY, ALSO.

[Special.]

WASHINGTON, August 17.

It may interest George William Curtis and other Mugwumps to know that the foreman in charge of the document-room at the national Democratic committee rooms, at No. 10 West Twenty-ninth street, New York, is John B. Trainer, secretary of the Congressional Library Commission, acting under appointment of Mr. Cleveland's Secretary of the Interior, and drawing a salary from the Government of $1,800 a year. Mr. Trainer is one of the active ward politicians of Albany, and an intimate friend of Colonel Lamont's, which explains his appointment as secretary of the Library Commission.

Mr. HALE. I have had this read only to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to what is alleged here as a gross violation of the President's orders, and in order that he may at once, or as soon as it is convenient, make a pilgrimage to the Interior Department, where the Secretary, I have no doubt, will at once lay his strong hand upon Mr. Trainer and either bring him home or remove him, or promote him, as a friend near me suggests. If that should fail, then I think it would be the duty of the Senator from Missouri to lay this case before the President, who has issued very stringent and urgent orders prohibiting just such practices as this, and then I am sure that this evil will be remedied.

Mr. VEST. Why does not the Senator from Maine, after his peculiar labors in behalf of civil-service reform, undertake the examination of this special case? According to the debate between him and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], had here a few days since, he has overwhelmed himself with responsibility in this regard, and it is but a single item in the vast delinquencies of this Administration to examine the case of Mr. Trainer.

I have not brought here the declarations of partisan newspapers. I would as soon quote from the writings of Tom Paine to a Christian congregation as to quote from the New York Tribune any statement which it might make against the Democratic party. It is simply impossible for a sheet so partisan as that to do justice to the opposite party however great may be its delinquencies or its faults.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to state that it was the Chicago Tribune from which I had an article read.

Mr. VEST. I do not understand the Chicago Tribune to be a Democratic paper. If it is my political knowledge is very defective in that regard.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly it is not.

Mr. ALLISON. The Chicago Tribune is a good Republican paper.

Mr. VEST. The New York Tribune and the Chicago Tribune are both Republican papers.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly they are.

Mr. VEST. And Republican Senators quote them here in sustaining charges against the Democratic party! I would not, partisan as I am, from my place in this Chamber quote from a partisan Democratic paper as to charges made upon these questions and statements of its reporters against the Republican party. I quoted from the records of the Pension Office, but I only did that—for my personal relations with the Senator from Illinois, as he knows, are of the kindest character—because he assailed my party, because he went out of his way in the discussion of an international question to assail the Democratic party and to declare that it was a party of sham, of fraud, and of pretense, and had trampled upon civil-service reform.

The Senator says, at the suggestion of some of his colleagues, that this man Cowperthwait, or whatever his name is, this member of the Republican State Legislature of Illinois, simply availed himself of the allowance of thirty days' leave of absence under the law. It is the strangest application for a leave of absence under the statute I have ever known, and there are certain expressions in it that rather militate against that construction, and I will read them. The first letter is dated July 17, 1883, and seems to have followed immediately on the appointment of this man, because the letter says:

Permit me to introduce to you Hon. E. E. Cowperthwait, whom you have just appointed. He has been compelled to remain at home a few days to get his business in shape. Mr. Cowperthwait is a member of our State Legislature and a man of very considerable political influence in the State. I shall be very grateful to you— .

And here is the milk of this political cocoanut—

I shall be very grateful to you for any special favor you may be able to extend to him, as it will be of political use to have him in the State, if it can be so arranged, after he gets familiar with the work.

That is to say, his official position is to be used in the State of Illinois for political purposes, for he is to be sent to Illinois, and he was taken from the State of Missouri and sent to the State of Illinois afterwards in violation of that rule of the Department which puts the examiners appointed from one State upon duty in another. This gentleman was appointed from Illinois and sent to the neighboring State of Missouri, but at the special request of the Senator from Illinois, on September 15, 1884, he is taken back from Missouri and sent to Illinois for a month's leave of absence for work in the campaign.

I am the last man who lives in public or private life who objects to any American citizen declaring his sentiments freely upon all public questions, and giving his influence legitimately to the advancement and upholding of any political system or any political principles. I have had occasion to express myself very decidedly upon that question during the present Administration as to appointees in my own State; but here is the case of a man asked to be sent to Illinois in order that his official position might be used for political service and political effect; and if that is not a violation of the civil-service rules, then, though I am not an expert on those rules, I do not understand the first principle on which they rest.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what matter is pending before the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Illinois has been laid over by consent until to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. I asked that the resolution should be laid over——

Mr. VEST. I thought the resolution was pending now.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Missouri interrupted the progress of business by referring to myself, speaking of me, and I think I have a right to respond.

Mr. VEST. Certainly you have.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as I am concerned, I have nothing whatever to take back with reference to any letters that I have written. If they are genuine, I stand by them. The Senator knows that every man in the employ of the Government is entitled to thirty days' leave, as other Senators have said here, with pay. I did not know at the time whether this gentleman was entitled to leave with pay or not; but I asked that he be given pay if it was allowable to be done, and it turned out that he was allowed twenty-three days with pay and the balance without; and that is all there is of it.

The Senator has seen proper, because I said something about this Administration yesterday, which I stand by, to drag my letters in here in the hope that he might deter me from asserting what I believe to be my right to assert on this floor or anywhere else.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senator's attention to the expression in his first letter, which has nothing to do with any leave of absence:

I shall be very grateful to you for any special favor you may be able to extend to him, as it will be of political use to have him in the State if it can be so arranged, after he gets familiar with the work.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir; I asked that whatever special favors Mr. Dudley could extend to him, consistent with law and the regulations, should be afforded; and I asserted what was true, that if the gentleman came into the State of Illinois he could be of use to the party in the State on the stump, and I have nothing further to say on that subject.

The Senator complains that I and perhaps others have brought Republican newspapers in here to show the inconsistency of this Administration, the hollowness of this Administration on the question of civil-service reform. I will have another article read which probably may sit a little better upon his stomach. It is a Mugwump paper from the city of Chicago, a very brief article on the subject. Perhaps the Senator will like that article read.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator hold me responsible for Mugwump utterances?

Mr. CULLOM. Of course I do.

Mr. VEST. If there is anything of the Mugwump about me, I would like to know it and get rid of it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Chicago Daily News, August 24, 1888.]

A LOGICAL RESULT.

Few people, even among the most offensively partisan Democrats, will regret the exhibition which the Democratic campaign committee has made of itself in Chicago. It was a matter of public notoriety that the management of the Chicago post-office was imbecile almost to the point of being doddering. There was no possibility of blunder which this management has not fathomed and tried. It was patent that it was clumsy, stupid, and ineffective in every possible direction in which clumsiness, stupidity, and ineffectiveness could be indecently exhibited. Yet it was into the diplomatic hands of S. Corning Judd, the architect of all these failures, that the Democratic committee confided the delicate and dangerous task of making the public servants in Chicago stand and deliver. We are not talking now of the immorality of this forced levy. Evidently neither Judd nor the committee recognizes any immorality in the transaction; they see in it practical politics and nothing else. But we can not help pointing out the fatuity which put such a task as this into the care of the diplomatic Judd. He was just as certain to do those things which neither he nor the committee wanted done—just as certain, by his left-handed, crass ineptitude, to erect the illegal levy upon the post-office employés into a public scandal—as though an asinine exposure of the committee's contempt for the civil-service law, its shameless defiance of the letter and the spirit of the Democratic platform, and its impudent breach of President Cleveland's promises were the ends to which all were working.

The whole affair was worthy of the men and the tools. They have got what they deserved, and what every one who knows Mr. Judd would have naturally and logically expected. The whole episode would be ludicrous if it were not so humiliating. The spectacle of the Machiavelian Judd covering his tracks by the secret and inscrutable device of having his law partner make the assessments; the ingenious idea of notifying the clerks by postal-card to come and be mulcted; and finally the brilliant strategy which Mr. Judd's partner displayed in unbosoming himself to a reporter—all go to make a picture of practical politics which we commend to all practical politicians as an example of what can be done by a man who puts his mind to it.

After all, it is harder to forgive an ass than a knave—especially an ass that masquerades as a knave and then falls at the first hurdle and tangles his hind legs in his halter. Perhaps the powers that in their wisdom give us postmasters may learn from this little example some of the general plans and specifications of the postmaster they have given us.

Mr. CULLOM. That is from a paper which is supporting this Administration and the re-election of Mr. Cleveland.

One word further and I will dismiss this subject so far as I am concerned. I did say yesterday that I could not resist the feeling, in view of all the circumstances attending the case, that this Administration was undertaking to divert the attention of the American people from the great issue that is before the people, to wit, whether this country will maintain the protective-tariff system or adopt a free-trade system; that they were attempting to divert the attention of the American people from that issue to another issue entirely foreign to it, and that after the treaty had been rejected by the Senate after long delay and discussion, instead of going to the law, as the President ought to have done, the law of 1887 that gave him the power of retaliation to protect American fishermen, he looked around and forgot almost that there was anything wrong in the treatment of American fishermen by Canada and hunted up a new excuse and threw that upon the country, and said if he retaliated at all he wanted to retaliate for every possible evil that existed between this country and Canada.

I showed a dispatch that was sent out by Mr. Townsend, the chairman of the State Democratic Committee of Ohio, dated the very same day that the message came to the Senate, which showed, as I think, an effort on the part of the Administration to get up a sort of boom for the Administration upon a different subject from that of the tariff and free trade. Hence it was that Mr. Townsend sent the telegram; which I will read again.

Have prominent Irishmen send congratulatory telegrams to President Cleveland on his message on the fishery treaty, and get up demonstration, if possible.

J. R. TOWNSEND,
Chairman Ohio State Central Committee.

That dispatch went out from the Democratic State Central Committee of Ohio on the same day that the message came in here, and then other dispatches by members of the national committee to the President I read here, and I have others that I might read, and from all this I came to the conclusion, as I think every man must, that it was simply an effort on the part of the Administration to divert attention from the question of protection or free trade to something else, so that they might not lose the great body of the laboring vote of this country.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10998.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. PASCO. I gave notice that I would call up the resolution of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] on the Louisiana elections this morning in order to make some remarks upon it, but after conference with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] I have concluded to wait until after this measure is disposed of. I shall ask that the resolution be taken up later in the day or to-morrow morning or at some convenient time hereafter.

Mr. MITCHELL. A few mornings since I introduced a resolution which was laid on the table. I gave notice at the time that I desired to submit a few remarks, occupying about fifteen or twenty minutes of time—not more than that. I now appeal to the Senator from Kansas in charge of the fortifications bill to permit the bill to be laid aside temporarily in order to enable me to do this, while he is getting his lunch.

Mr. PLUMB. The suggestion of the Senator about my desire to take lunch while he is speaking is entirely gratuitous, because I should certainly stay here and listen to every word he has to say, even losing my lunch for that purpose, which, I believe, is the custom of this body; but as the Senator can make his speech anyhow on the fortifications bill if he wants to do so, I am therefore really at his mercy, and of course I shall yield to his request.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am much obliged to the Senator. I ask that the pending order be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by me a few days since in reference to the disturbances at Corea.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. MITCHELL. The resolution has been read, and I ask unanimous consent to modify it so as to conform to the custom.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the right to modify his resolution without unanimous consent. The resolution as modified will be read.

DISTURBANCES IN COREA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. MITCHELL on the 22d instant, as modified by him to read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to transmit to the Senate copies of all official correspondence between the Department of State and the minister resident and consul-general of the United States at Seoul, Corea, and between such Department and the Corean envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary resident in Washington, occurring since January 1 last, including that relating to the recent disturbances and alleged massacre of Coreans in the streets of Seoul, Corea, on or about June 20, 1888, and touching the causes inciting thereto, if any—

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, before moving a reference of this resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to detain the Senate very briefly in submitting a few observations to which I desire to attract the attention of the Senate, and especially that of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

In my judgment, if ever the Government of the United States was under obligation, either morally or by virtue of treaty stipulation with any foreign power, to exert its good offices in favor of any struggling people or government being unjustly, arbitrarily, and oppressively dealt with, then it is now called upon by each of these considerations to extend such good offices in a considerate and proper manner to the Government and people of Corea.

Twelve years ago (in 1876) the Japanese Government, having itself some years previously entered into commercial treaties with the United States and also with several European nations, entered into a treaty with Corea, in virtue of which the independence of Corea was distinctly recognized. By its terms several Corean ports, three in number, I believe, were opened to the Japanese, and embassadors were provided for and exchanged between the two countries. This treaty also provided that the coasts of Corea, dangerous to navigation, and prior to that time unknown to the fleets of commerce, should be examined and surveyed by the Japanese. An international exposition between the two countries was also arranged, and was carried out in October, 1877, and on a scale and in a manner that would have done no discredit to governments whose date of original membership in the great family of treaty-making nations was many years prior to that of either Corea or Japan.

Subsequently, in 1878, the late Senator Sargent, of California, attracted the attention of the Senate and of the country to the history of Corea, the character of its people, the productive susceptibilities of its soil, its great mineral resources, and to the importance to the United States of establishing commercial relations in that direction; and at his instance a resolution was then adopted by the Senate authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commissioner to the King of Corea to arrange a treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and that government. This movement, though not immediately, in due time bore fruit, and four years later, in May, 1882, under the administration of President Arthur, a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and the Kingdom of Corea, or Chosen, was concluded. This treaty was ratified by the United States Senate January 9, 1882, and then it was that the traditional policy of isolation from the world's commerce, which the Empire of Japan had abandoned years before, was renounced by Corea. Other treaties with certain European powers followed, our treaty with Corea being the first that kingdom entered into with any Christian power. The Government of the United States, therefore, is now and has been since January, 1883, in solemn treaty stipulations of amity and peace, of commerce and navigation, with the Kingdom of Corea. And it may be as well in this connection to inquire briefly as to some of the more material stipulations contained in that treaty.

And first, it will be observed, it is stipulated in the beginning that—

There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between the President of the United States and the King of Chosen, and the citizens and subjects of their respective Governments.

But not only so; it is provided in the very next section, in Article I, as follows:

If other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either government, the other will exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feelings.

In no part or portion of this treaty from its beginning to its end is the dependency of Corea upon the Chinese Empire referred to, much less recognized, either directly or indirectly. And in all its stipulations the Kingdom of Corea is by our Government dealt with as an absolutely independent power in all its foreign relations. Not only so; it was stipulated that the high contracting powers might each appoint diplomatic representatives to reside at the court of the other; and furthermore, that each might appoint consular representatives at the ports of the other which are open to foreign commerce at their own convenience.

In the treaty, then, taken as a whole, and in all correspondence connected with and accompanying it, while the fact was not attempted to be concealed by either government that Corea was in a sense a state tributary to China, and with which relation the United States had no concern, the idea that a state of vassalage existed or that Corea was a dependent or vassal state of China found no countenance or recognition whatever; but on the contrary it was understood, and all the negotiations proceeded upon the assumption that Corea had always in the past, notwithstanding her tributary relation to China as a state, exercised through her King full sovereignty in all matters of internal administration and foreign relations. And it was on this basis that our treaty relations with Corea were entered into, and consequently, notwithstanding the absence of express treaty stipulations to that effect, it is quite evident that by virtue of such treaty, as a whole, the claim of Corean vassalage to China was completely overthrown so far as our Government is concerned. And not only so; but the Chinese Government in giving this treaty recognition, as it unquestionably did, after vain attempts while the terms of the treaty were sub judice between Corea and the United States, to secure, either by express or implied terms, recognition of the claim of a state of vassalage or dependency on China, expressly waived and abandoned, both in law and morals, any such claim.

Professor Wharton, in discussing the effect of our treaty relations with Corea, in paragraph 64, volume 1, of Wharton's Digest of International Law, makes this statement:

The existence of international relations between the two countries (the United States and Corea) as equal contracting parties is to be viewed simply as an accepted fact, and the independence of Corea of China is to be regarded by the United States as now established.

The late Secretary of State, Mr. Frelinghuysen, in his communication submitting the Corean treaty to the President to be forwarded to the Senate for ratification, refers to the contingency of such an assertion or enforcement of Chinese sovereignty over Corea by the Imperial Empire as would destroy the independence of that kingdom as something the very contemplation of which was not allowable.

Moreover, the diplomatic course of China with the United States and with other nations with which that Government is in treaty relation has been such as to repel the assumption of the existence of a state of Corean vassalage or dependence on China. China has never claimed that the Corean Kingdom was embraced in treaties between other governments and the Chinese Empire; nor has the Imperial Government of China ever admitted in her negotiations and diplomatic relations with other governments or otherwise that the empire was responsible for or represented the Kingdom of Corea.

The Chinese Government recognized the treaty, moreover, of February, 1876, entered into between Corea and Japan, and yet the first article of that treaty contains the following significant stipulation:

Chosen (Corea) being an independent state, enjoys the same sovereign rights as does Japan, and that their intercourse shall thenceforward be carried on in terms of equality and courtesy.

The existence of the relation of suzerain and vassal between China and Corea finds therefore no warrant or support in any of the treaty stipulations between either of these governments and any foreign power, nor yet by anything in connection with the history of the two governments, or that of their relations the one to the other for a century past. The one has not contributed to the other, either in men or money or arms, in aid of the prosecution of wars, either of invasion or defense. Not one of the well-known badges of dependence or vassalage is to be traced in the present relations or status, or in the recent past history of the relations of the two governments; none of the disabilities or disqualifying conditions of the lack of power to enter into treaty negotiations, to send out embassadors, to establish consulships, to levy war, or conclude peace, without doing so through a suzerain, which must necessarily obtain in the case of a dependent or vassal state, is found to exist in the case of Corea. On the contrary, Corea stands to-day in history and in virtue of international law as much an independent government as do any of the great Christian powers of the world. She stands to day in solemn treaty stipulation with several of the leading Christian powers. Her embassadors reside in the capitals of the most important and influential nations in Christendom, including that of the United States. All these great governments, including our own, which (I mean the latter) regards with disfavor that principle of national serfdom which recognizes the right of one government or country or people to enslave another government or country or people, and which looks with favor upon the doctrine of home rule and self-government and control, and of independence in the fullest sense of that significant term, have stipulated with Corea that if any power deals unjustly or oppressively with the Coreans, then their good offices will be exerted in their behalf to the end that perpetual peace and friendship may be maintained.

It is believed, and the correspondence called for by the pending resolution will doubtless show the fact, that for some time past the Imperial Government of China has, through its chief officers and representatives, and especially and particularly its representative at the city of Seoul, been contemplating the subjugation and entire absorption of Corea; that the conduct of that power and of its chief representative at Seoul has during the past two years, and especially more recently, been of such a systematically arbitrary, if not indeed wholly reprehensible character towards Corea and the Corean representatives, not excepting the King himself, as to be grossly unjust, unneighborly, and oppressive; and that the ultimate intention is upon the part of China to dethrone the King, abolish the existing government, and assume complete and absolute dictatorship over the Corean peninsula.

With a view, therefore, of securing reliable information in reference to this whole subject, and in no sense in any unfriendly spirit towards our minister resident and consul-general at Seoul, who is represented as a most able and intelligent gentleman, and as demeaning himself in a manner highly creditable to himself and all concerned, in view of the delicate subject with which he is called upon to deal, or without in any manner wishing by this to criticise the honorable Secretary of State, because I know of no reason whatever for any such criticism in connection with this matter, is the purpose of the introduction of the pending resolution.

In this connection I desire to state that the Hon. Owen N. Denny, a citizen of the United States and of the State of Oregon, formerly United States consul at Tien-Tsin, China, subsequently promoted to the position of United States consul-general at Shanghai, China, which position he held several years, when he resigned voluntarily, a gentleman of learning and experience, both as a lawyer and diplomat, thoroughly versed in international law and in political and commercial affairs in the East, and in all matters pertaining to the existing relations between China and Corea, and withal an American in every fiber of his nature, has for nearly three years past been in the service of the Corean King in the capacity of "adviser to the King and director of foreign affairs." I hold in my hand a very able and highly interesting brief prepared by Judge Denny on the relations existing between the two Governments of Corea and China, in which not only a careful history of these relations is given, but also the great public question as to the precise character of the relations sustained by Corea to the Chinese Empire is discussed with learning and ability. This relation is, as I believe, very correctly stated by Judge Denny to be that of a mere tributary state, in which none of the rights of sovereignty or independence are eliminated or destroyed, and not that of a dependent or vassal government without any of the prerogatives of sovereignty attaching. I desire to incorporate this paper into and make it a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The paper is as follows:

CHINA AND COREA.

[By O. N. Denny, adviser to the King and director of foreign affairs.]

A vacancy having occurred in the position of foreign adviser to the King of Corea and inspector of customs, and His Majesty having requested his excellency Li Chung Tang to procure the services of another, I was in July, 1885, invited to the post. I entered upon the duty of adviser, the customs branch of the position having been placed under the customs of China before my arrival in the East, with the assurance that in my efforts to preserve peace and good order and in all that pertained to the prosperity of Corea I should have the cordial support of the viceroy, an assurance which, I regret to say, has not been verified. On the contrary, from the very first, I have met with almost every conceivable kind of opposition from Chinese sources. The failure of the viceroy to keep his promise in this regard I am at a loss to understand, unless it is due to the Pekin Government's disapproval of his Corean policy. In view of this and the fact that China's course seems so unwarrantable and unjust, as well as against the best interest of Corea and China, I determined to avail myself of the present occasion to publicly point out—all efforts of a private character having failed—the dangerous ground China is trying to occupy, and to present Corea's side of the controversy, with a view to correcting, if possible, some of the accepted fallacies on the situation in the Peninsular Kingdom and its relations with the Celestial Empire, which have been so often misrepresented in the native and some of the foreign newspapers in China for the past two or three years, through design or under a misapprehension of the law as well as the facts. In doing this the harsher the criticisms may appear, the more it is to be regretted that they are merited.

First I shall notice China's claim to vassal or dependent relations with Corea; second, the former's treatment of her so-called vassal; third, the charge that the King is weak and unfit to govern the country; and before I have finished I shall endeavor to show that the former is about as fictitious as the latter is without foundation. As Corea, in the exercise of a right which none but sovereign and independent states possess, concluded a treaty of friendship, navigation, and commerce with Japan, independently of China, and later on with Western countries, in accordance with international usage, the rights acquired and the obligations assumed must be determined by the laws which have always governed the enforcement of such compacts. In the light of these defined and well-settled rules it will be in order to inquire into some of the rights, powers, and responsibilities of a sovereign state and how vassal relations are established, as well as into the duties and obligations a dependent state owes to its suzerain, in order to more clearly determine the political status of Corea. In general terms a sovereign or independent state is defined by almost all authors on international jurisprudence to be any nation or people, whatever the character or form of its constitution may be, which governs itself independently of other nations, while Wheaton, who ought to be the best authority in this case, as China has adopted him as her standard author, says, "Sovereignty is the supreme power by which any State is governed; this supreme power may be exercised either internally or externally. Internal sovereignty is that which is inherent in the people of any state or is vested in its ruler by its municipal constitution or fundamental laws. External sovereignty consists in the independence of one political society in respect to all other political societies, and it is by the exercise of this branch of sovereignty that the international relations of one political society are maintained in peace and in war with all other political societies." A nation which has always managed its internal as well as external concerns in its own way, free from the interference or dictation of any foreign power, is juridically independent and must be ranked in the category of sovereign states. The unerring test, however, of a sovereign and independent state is its right to negotiate, to conclude treaties of friendship, navigation, and commerce, to exchange public ministers, and to declare war and peace with other sovereign and independent powers. These are rights and conditions compatible and consistent with sovereignty which, when possessed by a state, place it in the great family of independent nations, while states which do not possess such powers must be ranked as semi-independent or dependent, according to the expressed terms of the agreement. An advocate of vassalage in the North China Daily News, some months ago, in support of his position, used substantially the following language: "At the end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth centuries the sanction of the Chinese Emperor had to be obtained before the successor chosen by the King of Corea could receive the title of heir-apparent, and then could not assume the title of King until it was conferred on him by Pekin."

The correspondent states the case much stronger than the facts warrant. If he had put it in the form of a request, a graceful act by a tributary state, rather than on the basis of an imperative obligation to the Peking Government, he would have been more in accord with the facts, but whether he over or under stated them makes no material difference, as relations of vassalage were never established by the commands of a superior in exceptional cases or through the differential acts of an inferior. Liu Kiu, Anam and Burmah, in the history of China's precarious claims to vassalage over those States, did the same thing, and to-day the first named forms a part of the sovereignty of the Empire of Japan, the second belongs to the Republic of France, while the third recently passed to the sovereign control of Great Britain. Wheaton on the Law of Nations states the case infinitely stronger against the correspondent than the latter does in favor of China's contention when he says: "The sovereignty of a particular state is not impaired by its occasional obedience to the commands of other states, or even the habitual influence exercised by them over its councils. It is only when this obedience or this influence assumes the form of express compact that the sovereignty of the state inferior in power is legally affected by its connection with the other."

John Austin, a modern writer of considerable celebrity on international law, in one of his able lectures delivered in London in 1873, states the case with equal clearness when he says: "A feeble state holds its independence precariously or at the will of the powerful states to whose aggressions it is obnoxious, and since it is obnoxious to its aggressions it and the bulk of its subjects render obedience to commands which they occasionally express or intimate; but since the obedience and commands are comparatively few and rare they are not sufficient to constitute the relation of sovereignty and subjection between the powerful states and the feeble states with its subjects. In spite of those commands and in spite of that obedience the feeble state and its subjects are an independent political society whereof the powerful states are not the sovereign portion. Although the powerful states are permanently superior and although the feeble state is permanently inferior there is neither the habit of command nor a habit of obedience on the part of the latter; and although the latter is unable to defend and maintain its independence, the latter is independent of the former in fact or practice."

The only vassal or dependent relations recognized by the law of nations are those resulting from conquest, international agreement, or convention of some kind, and as such relations do not exist between the two countries by virtue of either of these requirements, and in all reasonable probability will never be established by agreement or convention, it remains to be seen whether they will exist in future by conquest. Corea, however, is a tributary state of China; relations which have been sustained in the past with the utmost good faith, and which Corea desires in all sincerity to continue so long as China's treatment is generous, friendly, and just. But the tributary relations one state may hold to another do not and can not in any degree affect its sovereign and independent rights. For this reason the tribute annually paid by Corea to China does not impair her sovereignty or independence any more than the tribute now paid by the British Government to China on account of Burmah impairs the sovereign and independent rights of the British Empire; or the tribute formerly paid by the principal maritime powers of Europe to the Barbary States affected the sovereign rights and independence of those European powers.

Wheaton says concerning the Barbary States that "while they are anomalous in character, yet their occasional obedience to the commands of the Sultan, accompanied with irregular payments of tribute, does not prevent them from being considered by the Christian powers of Europe and America as independent states with whom the international relations of war and peace are maintained on the same footing with other Mohammedan sovereignties." There are good and valid reasons why Corea desires to prefer the traditional relations of close friendship which have so happily existed between the two countries so long. Their geographical positions under friendly intercourse make them a source of strength to each other, while the fact that Corea has drawn largely upon China's population, language, religion, laws, education, arts, manners, and custom, which have contributed so much to the sum total of Corean civilization, all combine to strengthen the chain of attachment and cause her to look to China as in the past for friendly advice rather than in any other direction; and in my judgment nothing will interrupt this friendship but a continuation of the illegal and high-handed treatment Corea is now receiving at the hands of the Chinese and their studied and persistent attempt to destroy Corean sovereignty by absorbing the country.

It was due to the faith which the King had in China's professions of friendship for Corea that induced His Majesty, when the advisability of making treaties with western countries was pressed upon him, to take council of the distinguished viceroy at Tien-Tsin, and I know of my own knowledge that it was due to a similar faith in the king that induced the Chung Chang to advise the establishment of such relations, as the surest means of improving the condition of the country and people, as well as preserving the sovereign rights of his kingdom; and later on, when the first of the western treaties came to be negotiated—which was with America—the viceroy was invited as the friend of the king, having the broadest experience in such important matters, to assist in the negotiations. Two draughts were submitted to that convention for consideration, one by the viceroy and the other by the special envoy who conducted the negotiations for the United States. The very first clause in the viceroy's draught was a demand for the negotiation of vassal or dependent relations between China and Corea, which the agent of the United States Government declined to consider or even discuss further than to say that as his mission was to make a treaty of commerce and friendship with an independent state, such a treaty he would make or none at all. Notwithstanding this, the viceroy urged the approval of this dependent clause to a point beyond which he could not go without breaking off negotiations, when he yielded and the treaty was then concluded upon the basis of other independent states, and was signed at Chemulpo May 22, 1882. Even if vassalage had been acknowledged in the American treaty by the negotiators, it would not have received the approval either of the United States Government or the King of Corea.

The next treaty that Corea made was in October following with China and at the latter's request, and while this treaty has been denominated "rules for the land and water commerce between the trading populations of China and Corea," and while there is the usual mystification and vagueness pervading it that characterizes all of China's intercourse with the peninsular kingdom, yet it comes nearer being a treaty of friendship, navigation, and commerce than anything else, as I shall endeavor to point out further on. Treaties with other countries followed in quick succession in the general tenor of the American one, which were, however, discussed and concluded, not at Tien-Tsin, but in Seoul, without reference to the viceroy or the Chinese Government. Had vassalage existed between the two countries in accord with international jurisprudence at the time the American treaty was made, does any one, at all versed in public affairs, suppose that the viceroy would have tried so hard to procure their acknowledgment by a friendly power in a public treaty? No; the attempt was based solely on the utter weakness of the contention, which no one appreciated more fully than the viceroy himself.

After the ratification of the American treaty the question of dependency, for the moment at least, seems to have been abandoned; at all events arrangements were at once made for the enforcement of the stipulations of the treaty. Ports were opened, a customs service established by the King, with inspector, commissioners, and a full staff of subordinate officers for the work. Diplomatic representatives were appointed as treaties were ratified, who from time to time presented their credentials and took their respective places at His Majesty's court in Seoul, and among them was the representative of China, with the title of His Imperial Majesty's commissioner printed on his card, and appointed in pursuance of the treaty already referred to. This official continued in an unassuming way to represent his government upon terms of equality with his colleagues for more than two years, when he was succeeded by the present Commissioner Yuan for supposed meritorious services rendered his government in the disturbance of 1881, who for a short time followed in the footsteps of his predecessor; but the honor so suddenly thrust upon him seems to have inflated him to such an extent that serious consequences might have resulted to him had not his indiscreet enthusiasm found vent in the resurrection of the dependency scheme, which for the credit of his government ought never again to have come to the surface, for if the conclusion of the Japanese and American treaties upon the basis of Corean independence, every article of the latter having been approved by the viceroy, followed by similar treaties with the leading powers of Europe, and China having shared in the practical operations for two and a half years did not honorably settle it, the question ought finally to have disappeared when the Li-Ito convention adjourned, by the terms of which China disposed of whatever right she had left without the consent of Japan to send troops to Corea, the only means as a last resort every independent nation possesses of enforcing its sovereign rights when assailed or called in question.

Some time in 1885, after I had been invited to Corea, but before my arrival, a policy of absorption, gradual or otherwise, seems to have been decided upon by the Pekin Government. The position of advisor and inspector of customs was seggregated, and the customs service passed to the control and direction of the Chinese service under the plausible assurance that it would be better and more economically administered, and that there was no political significance to be attached to the change, and, while the service has been honestly and well administered under the change, yet no one act since the conclusion of the treaties has contributed so much to mislead the public mind in regard to the true relations existing between China and Corea politically than this ill-advised one on the part of the Corean Government. Neither in the mean while was Commissioner Yuan idle, for it was about this time that he adopted as a title for his legation that miserable misnomer and subterfuge, "Residency," and in the most insolent way claimed to advise and even direct the King in long-winded memorials, and upon public and official occasions to assume the rôle of host instead of guest on the flimsy pretext that he is "at home" in Corea. But it is asserted that vassalage is distinctly acknowledged in the treaty sometimes called the overland trade regulations above alluded to. Now, I assert with much confidence that if that convention establishes anything, so far as this question is concerned, it is exactly the contrary to this.

While there are only eight rather lengthy articles in that treaty, yet as already observed they cover about all that is necessary in an ordinary treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation. Under the first article China has dispatched her commissioner with diplomatic powers to Seoul, and consuls to all the open ports to guard the interests of Chinese merchants. The second article yields to China ex-territorial privileges for her subjects similar to those enjoyed by the citizens and subjects of the most favored nations. Article III permits the merchant ships of both countries to visit the open ports of the other, fixes the duties to be paid, provides for relief in case of ship-wrecks, regulates the conduct of fishing vessels, etc. Article IV permits merchants of either country to visit the open ports of the other for the purposes of trade, where they may purchase lands and houses, provides tonnage dues as well as re-export tariff, inhibits trade at the capital of both countries, compels merchants wishing to purchase native produce in the interior to first obtain permits of their consuls, while persons desiring to travel in either country for pleasure must be provided with passports.

Article VII provides for the dispatch once a month to Corea of a vessel belonging to the China Merchants' Company, and permits Chinese men-of-war to repair to the open ports of Corea for the purpose of protecting Chinese consuls and other residents.

In the text of this treaty there is not only no reference to vassalage or dependency, but the demands and concessions made exclude the existence of such relations at the time it was concluded. If China believed in the validity of vassal relations, can it be supposed that provisions would have been made for exterritorial privileges and passports for Chinese subjects in Corea? Certainly not, for to have done so would have presented the spectacle of a sovereign state demanding exterritorial rights and privileges for her own subjects within her own sovereignty, which is the very acme of absurdity. The only reference to vassalage is in a preamble published at the head of the treaty, which may or may not have been in its present form at the time the treaty was signed. This extraordinary preamble begins as follows: "Corea has long been one of our vassal states, and in all that concerns rights and observances there are already fixed prescriptions which require no change." Can this be the language of a high joint convention created, not to sign away the rights of a sovereign nation, but to protect them in its intercourse with a neighboring state?

It seems rather the ex parte assertion of a fallacy, than any proof of the existence of a fact. But the closing paragraph of this preamble, if anything, is still more remarkable. It reads: "It is understood that the present rules * * * are to be viewed in the light of a favor granted by China to a dependent state and are not in the category of favored-nation treatment applied to other states." Is it a favor to Corea for that state to grant exterritorial privileges to the subjects of China while the latter lays claim to vassalage over the former? Is it a favor to Corea to permit Chinese men-of-war to repair to her open ports to protect Chinese consuls and other residents? And, finally, is it a favor to overrun the Corean capital with Chinese merchants while there is not a Corean merchant in all China? There is an additional reason why this preamble must be viewed with suspicion, and that is this: as the viceroy was one of the plenipotentiaries who concluded the treaty it is "quite out of the range of reason to believe that that distinguished official could have been a party to the assertion that the rules alluded to in the preamble "are not in the category of favored-nation treatment applied to other states," for hardly five months before this he discussed and sanctioned as the professed friend of Corea the fourteenth article of the American treaty, which provides as follows: "The high contracting powers hereby agree that should at any time the King of Chosen grant to any nation or to the merchants or citizens of any nation any right, privilege, or favor connected either with navigation, commerce, political, or other intercourse which is not conferred by this treaty such right, privilege, or favor shall freely inure to the benefit of the United States, its public officers, merchants, and citizens." But said the most eminent statesman of the Celestial Empire recently: "Corea is a vassal of China's, because upon the conclusion of treaties with western countries the King gave to the plenipotentiaries who conducted the negotiations autograph letters to be conveyed to the heads of their respective governments in which such relations were admitted."

Here again I must take issue with the assertion, even though it is made by so eminent a personage as Li Chung Tang. It is true that just prior to signing the American treaty an autograph letter was handed down by the King to be delivered with it to the President of the United States, but that letter admitted nothing more than the King now asserts, namely, that Corea is a tributary state of China, but which, as I have endeavored to point out, does not affect, much less destroy, the sovereign rights of a state, while it asserts in language that can not be misunderstood the sovereign and independent character which the Corean Government has always maintained. Subsequent autograph letters given by His Majesty were, in effect, the same as the first one, so far at least as the relations of Corea to China are concerned. The following is a correct translation of the letter of the King to the President of the United States:

"His Majesty, the King of Chosen, herewith makes a communication. Chosen has been from ancient times a state tributary to China, yet hitherto full sovereignty has been exercised by the Kings of Chosen in all matters of internal administration and foreign relations. Chosen and the United States in establishing now by mutual consent a treaty are dealing with each other upon a basis of equality. The King of Chosen distinctly pledges his own sovereign powers for the complete enforcement in good faith of all the stipulations of the treaty in accordance with international law. As regards the various duties which devolve upon Chosen as a tributary state to China, with these the United States has no concern whatever. Having appointed envoys to negotiate a treaty, it appears to be my duty in addition thereto to make this preliminary declaration.

MAY 15, 1882.

To the President of the United States:

Whatever interpretation the advocates of vassalage may choose to put upon the plain, candid, and unmistakable language contained in the above letter, or however much they may attempt to twist or pervert its meaning, it is perfectly clear that the American Government has given it a construction strictly in accord with its phraseology as well as spirit, for they now hold that, under the treaty of friendship and commerce which accompanied it, the question of Corea's vassalage to China has been definitely settled so far at least as that government is concerned. In paragraph 64, first volume of Wharton's Digest of International Law of the United States, the following language is used by the Government: "The existence of international relations between the two countries (the United States and Corea) as equal contracting parties is to be viewed simply as an accepted fact," and "the independence of Corea of China is to be regarded by the United States as now established." Neither does the American Government stand alone in this regard, for at least two other great powers claiming relations to the peninsula, equal in importance politically as well as commercially to those claimed by China, insist on maintaining the same sovereignty for Corea that the United States does, while it is the solemn joint declaration of Japan and Corea, as expressed in the first article of their treaty, concluded February, 1876, which declares that, "Chosen, being an independent state, enjoys the same sovereign rights as does Japan, and that their intercourse shall thenceforward be carried on in terms of equality and courtesy." Independently of the treaties which have been made with Corea, the historical relations of that country with China, under the present dynasty—at least for the last two hundred of its reign—do not admit the existence of any such conditions toward each other as suzerain and vassal.

When these relations are held by states in the legal international acceptation of the term, that which disturbs the heart of the sovereign affects the pulse of the vassal, and yet so far as is known neither the wars which have been waged against China by foreign states, nor her rebellions, nor internal dissensions have apparently disturbed or concerned Corea any more than if one nation had been located near the north pole and the other in the tropics. And yet it was the duty of Corea as a vassal of China to have furnished an army from her hundreds of thousands of soldiers which she has had or could have raised at any stage of her civilization as well as munitions of war, to aid China in the hour of her greatest need; but not a soldier, gun, or dollar seem to have crossed over from Corea for that purpose. In addition to this important fact, if such relations ever existed, they ought certainly to have left their imprint on the civilization of Corea, either upon the national emblems, coins, laws, or in some other way as public notice to other nations of China's responsibility when grievances were to be redressed or wrongs atoned, as well as an acknowledgment on Corea's part of the acceptance of such relations.

To those who are versed in international affairs Corea can not be considered a dependent state, for the reason that the law and the facts have placed her in the column of sovereign and independent states, where she will remain, unless, through the force of superior numbers, she is taken out of it. Corea has the right of negotiation; a vassal state has not. Corea has concluded treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation with other sovereign and independent states without reference to China, which a vassal can not do; and in virtue of those treaties has dispatched public ministers to the courts of her respective treaty powers, while vassal states can not even appoint consuls-general, but only consuls and commercial agents. Corea has the right to declare war or peace, which a vassal can not do except through its suzerain. China under her treaty is represented at the Corean court by a diplomatic officer, and by consuls at all the open ports, and when the interests of the Corean Government demand it they will be similarly represented in China, or friendly intercourse will surely cease to exist between the two governments. The following language of Bluntshli, a modern international jurist of great clearness, is forcibly applied here.

He says: "Inasmuch as sovereignty tends to unity, such distinctions between vassal sovereignty and sovereign sovereignty can not subsist long. History shows us the truth of this principle. During the middle ages a quantity of vassal states existed both in Europe and Asia. To-day they have nearly all disappeared because they have been transformed into sovereign states or have been absorbed by more powerful states. International law ought to keep an account of their development. It ought to respect it. It ought not to contribute to retard it by seeking to perpetuate the unsustainable formalities of an antiquated jurity." International law will keep an account of their development too, and in its vigilance for the rights of the weak will keep an account of Corea also in her struggle for the maintenance of independent statehood. After having been by the great nations of the international world literally dragged from that seclusion which had for so many centuries enveloped the little kingdom in mystery to join the family of civilized nations under the express guaranty of assistance in the event of oppression or unjust treatment, those powers will surely not permit the stultification of this assurance by allowing their younger member to be strangled at the very threshold of its international life.

China's friend and ally Corea desires to be, but her voluntary slave never.

The Austro-Hungarian minister of state, M. Kalnoky, lately said, "A vassal state in the nineteenth century is an anachronism." However this may be, the times will indeed be sadly out of joint when China succeeds by her peculiar methods in establishing vassalage with Corea; not only so, but when she does a new chapter will have to be added to international jurisprudence, the principles of which such well-known expounders as Grotius, Vattel, and Wheaton never comprehended.

Even for China at this late date, after yielding the point in the treaties, and until recently acquiescing in the execution of all their provisions, declining responsibility for Corea's conduct at times when responsibility stood for something and having concluded a treaty with Corea herself, now to claim the existence of dependent relations is not only to abuse language and offend intelligence, but it is also an attempt to defy international precedents.

But perhaps the most careless and inexcusable assertion in relation to this question is the one that the Corean Government admits its vassalage without any qualifications whatever, for nothing is further from the truth; and when the King, under well-considered advice, appointed a minister to Japan, and afterward the plenipotentiaries to Europe and America, in order if possible to break up the pernicious meddlesomeness of the Chinese with Corean affairs, and which met with such stubborn opposition from the Peking Government, as well as adverse criticism in certain public journals in the East, His Majesty emphasized by that public act his denial of this fallacious statement. Apparently there is no limit to the tricks and devices resorted to by the advocates of vassalage. A correspondent of the Mainichi Shimbun, writing to that paper on the 17th of November last, seems to have fallen a victim to one of these, for he says; "It appears that a convention on the appointment by Corea of ministers in foreign countries has been concluded between her and China, and that it consists of the following three articles:

"First. The Corean minister of state shall, before sending a minister abroad, ask advice of the Chinese minister in Corea.

"Second. Should the Corean minister abroad have occasion to communicate with the representative of any other foreign power in the same country on a matter of business he shall consult with the Chinese minister in that country.

"Third. The Corean minister of state shall, no matter what the official rank of a minister appointed by them to a foreign country may be, not allow him to take precedence over the Chinese representative in the same country."

The only document which could be tortured into anything like the above articles is the following telegraphic instructions from the viceroy to Commissioner Yuan about the 5th of November last:

"First. After arriving at his post the Corean representative has to call at the Chinese legation to ask the assistance of the minister and to go with the Corean representative to the foreign office to introduce him, after which he may call where he likes.

"Second. If there happen to be festivities at the court, or an official gathering, or any dinner, or the health of some one is drunk, or in meeting together, the Corean representative has always to take a lower place than the Chinese representative.

"Third. If there happen to be any important or serious question to discuss, the Corean representative has first to consult secretly with the Chinese minister and both have to talk over the matter and think together. This rule is compulsory, arising from the dependent relations, but as this does not concern other governments, they will not be able to inquire into the matter. At present the question (sending ministers) has not been decided by imperial decree. They (the Coreans) have to be advised in a friendly spirit. China and Corea have to cherish for each other feelings of relationship. Ministers are selected from among the mandarins of reputation; therefore confidence and respect have to be shown them, and this is the way Corean representatives should treat the representatives of China. This has to be communicated to the Corean foreign office, then to be handed over to the King, who must order his representatives to act accordingly."

But notwithstanding the above command the King did not "order his representatives to act accordingly." His Majesty replied substantially that while his ministers would be instructed to show due respect and deference to the ministers of China, yet as he had appointed, in pursuance of all treaties with Corea, full ministers, he could not now change their titles without giving cause for unfavorable comment as well as unjust suspicions. Having, therefore, appointed full ministers, they should, in their presentation at court, be governed by the rules of etiquette which govern the presentation of the ministers from other countries. Accordingly the original instructions to the ministers, which do not contain any of the above conditions, were permitted to stand. As a matter of fact the Corean minister to Washington was presented to the President by the honorable Secretary of State and to the Secretary of State entirely independent of the Chinese minister, which caused the latter to telegraph to the viceroy at Tien-tsin, who, in turn, telegraphed to Yuan in Seoul, who, with his usual tactics, undertook to stir up the president of the foreign office, but all to no purpose.

Neither will the minister to Europe be presented at court by the Chinese ministers. Even if such an anomalous proceeding were attempted it would be hardly carried out for there is no country of respectability, jealous of its national honor, that will care to set the absurd and unprecedented example of receiving a plenipotentiary, envoy, or minister of any sort from a vassal state. Even the so-called memorial (letter) which the King addressed to the Emperor of China, in answer to questions from Peking explaining his reasons for as well as his right to send ministers to Europe and America, is regarded by China and by vassalage advocates as another link in the chain which they hope is to bind Corea to the Celestial Empire. The trouble seems to arise from this: the language used by the King to express his tributary relations is persistently and erroneously interpreted to mean vassal relations by China and her supporters. When the King refers in the so-called memorial to the Emperor, to tributary envoys and plenipotentiaries, he is entirely consistent with international jurisprudence as applied by other nations in their intercourse with each other, while China's appellations of vassal envoys and plenipotentiaries is a misnomer because entirely inconsistent with the laws of civilized nations.

Such laws do not recognize vassal envoys, plenipotentiaries, or ministers of any kind, for the reason that vassal states have the power to create only consuls and commercial agents. In this connection there is another trick which deserves attention, and that is this, letters or documents written or translated to suit the occasion, are frequently published in the press of China purporting to be from the King of Corea, inferentially if not positively admitting Corea's vassalage. In answer to such statements I am informed, upon the very best authority, that the King has never admitted, in document or otherwise, the existence of such relations, and further, if anything has been admitted by any official of the government at any time which even implies vassalage, it is without authority and void. The King knows only too well the object of the insidious conduct of China towards his country; aside from this, he can not be induced or intimidated into admitting a national fallacy. Even if dependent relations could be created by admissions, and the King, under the threatening, violent, and criminal treatment of China for two and a half years past, were to admit vassalage in the most abject way, it would not be binding upon his government, for admissions under duress are not only no evidence of a fact, but they are not even admissions.

Other independent states with but few commercial interests to protect and no questions of sovereignty to settle, dispatch to foreign countries public ministers, and nothing is said against it; but when the King of Corea, in accordance with the expressed stipulations in all the treaties with other independent powers, does the same thing a perfect shower of invective greets the public ear from some quarters, while from others more mild the act is characterized as mischievous and ill-advised: that it was forcing to the front a question which ought to have been kept in the background, while the King and his advisers turned their attention to the development of the resources of the country. It is quite true that the question was forced to the front, not by the King and his advisers, but by the tyranny and oppression of China, largely through the conduct of Commissioner Yuan which, for petty schemes, criminality, injustice, and brutality, has seldom, if ever, been equaled in the annals of international intercourse. With a view to placing the heel of China on the neck of Corea he has not only opposed almost every effort which has been made in the direction of internal development, but he has, through the mercenary brigade which he always keeps about him, brought failure and ridicule upon almost every effort the better class of Coreans have made to transact business for the government or themselves, in order to make it appear that the Coreans are but a nation of helpless children, who can never learn business, and who, for that reason, need a Chinese guardian over them.

He has threatened the King repeatedly, through certain Corean officials, with the Chinese army and navy and with the vengeance of the viceroy in order to compel compliance with his wishes and demands, while, to weaken the royal authority in the eyes of officials and subjects alike, he has abused and trampled upon the long-established and sacred customs of the court by riding in his chair into the palace, almost up to the very entrance leading to the presence of the King, accompanied by his coolies, servants, and horsemen, who at times have conducted themselves in a disorderly manner; while in the excitement of July and August of 1886, which he was the principal cause of, and which, judging from his action, was intended as an excuse for violent measures, arising out of his attempt to force the Government to admit that the King was the author of a letter His Majesty never wrote, said to contain a request for the protection of a friendly power against the aggressions of China, the language and conduct of China's representative would have done credit to the chief of braggadocios. In some of his conduct he has been more or less applauded and encouraged by one or two foreign officials, while in all of his disreputable work he has been much assisted by a few petty Chinese officials, as well as by certain of China's gunboats sent to the open ports in Corea for the purpose of "protecting Chinese consuls and merchants," as stipulated in their treaty, and, as alleged and published in the preamble to such treaty, "as a favor granted by China to a dependent state," which have been detected in some of their attempts to smuggle red ginseng out of the country. These gunboats also, on their arrival from China, are in the habit of bringing more or less cargo, which their officers demand shall be landed without examination, while the customs authorities urge the right of inspection, as in ordinary cases, to see whether or not it contains dutiable goods. Invariably the Chinese consul takes up the side of the gunboat people, and in their behalf appeals to Commissioner Yuan in Seoul, who in turn threatens and abuses the president of the foreign office until the order is given to pass the goods without examination. The last case of smuggling ginseng by one of these gunboats, so far as is known, occurred in October, when several thousand dollars' worth of the drug were seized, the largest chest of which was covered by the seal and signature of Commissioner Yuan. The chief commissioner of customs has done all in his power to break up these lawless and fraudulent practices. He has appealed to the president of the foreign office, to the viceroy at Tien-Tsin, and to the inspector-general of customs in China to aid him in enforcing the laws and regulations of the Corean customs service, but thus far without avail.

The president of the foreign office frankly says he is powerless as against the Chinese in these matters. Even with the fraudulent treatment it has received, the customs revenues for the year just closed amounted to the sum of $250,000, a sum which, under legitimate and fair treatment, would have been considerably increased, thereby avoiding the apparent necessity for some persons to waste so much false sympathy over the expenditure of a few thousand dollars in sending ministers to Europe and America. But the culminating act of China's representative for cold-blooded villainy lies in his plot, exposed in July last, to dethrone and carry off the King to make temporary room for a pliant tool. The execution of this diabolical business involved riot, arson, bloodshed, and probable assassinations, besides imperiling the lives of all the foreigners in Seoul, as well as those of many native people. Every detail of this wicked conspiracy is in possession of the King, and which would, no doubt, have been carried out but for the integrity and loyalty of Prince Min Yong Ik, one of the ablest and truest of Corean subjects, who, with the knowledge of the King, had been let into the plot, and who faithfully reported its different phases from time to time to His Majesty as well as myself, who were enabled thereby to control and defeat it. Perhaps the most extraordinary part of this infamous business is the draught of it which was to have been, and doubtless was, submitted to the viceroy for his approval or rejection.

The principal features of this draught were as follows: Native soldiers were to be drilled at Kang Wha under the pretext of garrisoning the point against the "outside barbarians." These soldiers were to be reviewed by the Chinese representative, in order that they might readily recognize their commander at the critical moment. They were to be placed conveniently near to the palace. Then the Tai Wan Kiun, or the ex-regent's palace or house, was to be fired and the work of the incendiary laid at the door of the King, which was to be the signal for an uprising of the ex-regent's following, who hate the Queen and her party with intense bitterness. The rioters were to attack the palace, when Commissioner Yuan was to appear on the ground, as he did in 1884, and in command of the troops already referred to, under the pretense of quelling the rioters, was to take possession of the person of the King and carry him out of the palace and then declare the son of the King's elder brother heir-apparent and the ex-regent regent until the heir agreed upon attained his majority, thereby enabling the Chinese, under the direction of the regent, to thoroughly invest the government and country. Neither did China's representative neglect the financial part of the scheme, for he placed in the hands of a certain general 3,000 taels (about $4,500,000), out of which the expenses of drilling and moving the troops were to be paid. This sum was, however, returned to the Chinese legation after the departure of Min Yong Ik and the collapse of the conspiracy.

The Chinese Government can not plead ignorance of the conduct of their officials in Corea, for they have been fully advised from time to time through different channels. Twice I visited Tien-Tsin under authority from the king, when the fullest discussions were had with the viceroy with respect to Yuan's extraordinary conduct and the policy of the Pekin Government towards Corea. In my first interview, in September, 1886, I urged an amicable understanding between China and Russia, as well as Japan, in regard to the political affairs of the peninsula as the surest means of preventing irritation and disorder, and before my return the viceroy assured me that such an understanding would not only be reached, but that China would change her representative, as Yuan was too young, not only in years but also in experience, for such a post. In fact, said the viceroy, the position has already been tendered to the present Taotai of Tien-Tsin and the Taôtai who has just been appointed at Cheefoo, but that both had declined. On the occasion of my second visit, in October of last year, to discuss Corea's right to send public ministers abroad and to open ports in the interest of trade, as well as to expose Yuan's latest villainy, if it became necessary, in one interview; finding that the viceroy turned a deaf ear to everything reflecting in any way upon Yuan, I was about to dispose of him once for all, as I supposed, by presenting the indisputable evidences of his recent conspiracy when, to my amazement, the viceroy cooly informed me that he knew all about the dethronement scheme.

That while Yuan was in it, yet it was all the fault of Min Yong Ik, who laid the plot and induced Yuan to go into it, and that for his stupidity in letting himself be drawn into such a thing he had been severely reprimanded. The reprimand was due probably not so much to Yuan's stupidity for being drawn into it, as the viceroy said, as to the detection and failure of his own wicked conspiracy. And still, in the face of this criminal record, Yuan continues the representative of China to Corea, in violation of the closing paragraph of the first article of the treaty between the two countries, which says: "Should any such officer disclose waywardness, masterfulness, or improper conduct of public business, the superintendent of trade for the northern port and the King of Corea respectively will notify each other of the fact and at once recall him." In view of all this the inquiry naturally suggests itself, why is the commissioner stubbornly kept in Seoul? Is it because China, desiring to take possession of Corea, and having no excuse in the eyes of civilized nations for doing so, expects him, through his violent conduct, to furnish one? It is to be hoped not.

Nor is this all. What must be the moral status of a government which insists on being represented at the court of a neighboring state by a smuggler, conspirator, and diplomatic outlaw? I submit, the language is not too strong, in view of the facts and the following record applicable to them, copied from a well-known author on international law: "Several instances are to be found in history of ambassadors being seized and sent out of the country. The Bishop of Ross, ambassador of Mary Queen of Scots, was imprisoned and then banished from England for conspiring against the sovereign, while the Duke of Norfolk and other conspirators were tried and executed. In 1534 De Mendoza, the Spanish ambassador in England, was ordered to quit the realm for conspiring to introduce troops to dethrone Queen Elizabeth. In 1654 De Bass, the French minister, was ordered to depart the country in twenty-four hours, on a charge of conspiring against the life of Cromwell. In 1717 Gyllenborg, the Swedish ambassador, contrived a plot to dethrone George I. He was arrested, his cabinet broken open and searched, and his papers seized. Sweden arrested the British minister at Stockholm by way of reprisal. The arrest of Gyllenborg was necessary as a measure of self-defense, but on no principle of international law can the arrest of the British minister by Sweden be made justifiable.

For similar reasons, Callamare, Spanish ambassador in France, was, in 1718, arrested, his papers seized, and himself conducted to the frontier by military escort. So recently as 1843, Sir H. Bulwer, the British ambassador in Spain, had his passports returned, and was requested to leave Spanish territory by the government. Certain disturbances had taken place in certain parts of Spain, and the government persuaded themselves that Sir H. Bulwer had lent his assistance to the disaffection." And had the Corean Government possessed the national strength to enforce their rights, another case of far more recent date would have been added to the above list in the person of Commissioner Yuan. The Chinese authorities seemed to be considerably exercised over the surrender of Kim Ok Kiun by the Japanese Government, in order that he might be justly punished for his conspiracy, and who would doubtless have been willingly given up by that government were not international precedents against the surrender of political offenders; and yet the conspiracies of the Chinese representative are of a far graver character than those of Kim Ok Kiun, for the former's were directed against the King, the head and front of all government in the kingdom, while the latter's were directed more against certain high officials than otherwise.

If the Chinese authorities were sincere in their efforts to have Kim Ok Kiun properly punished for his crimes then, they surely will not condone the greater offense of their own representative against the King now. The oppressive conduct of China is not confined alone to her small officials in Corea, nor to those who periodically visit the country in gunboats, for it extends to Tien-tsin and Peking.

After my return from the north where I went to inspect the natural resources of that part of Corea, I recommended among other things that as Ping Yang is the center of a large section of country, rich in agricultural and mineral wealth, legitimate trade would be encouraged and increased, the customs revenues largely augmented, the smuggling carried on in and out of the Tatong River checked, while the preliminary work of opening the valuable coal and other mines located near there, already determined upon by the government, would be facilitated by estabiishing an open port at or near that city. The proposition was also warmly supported by the chief commissioner of customs, and subsequently that efficient officer was instructed by the King to take the preliminary steps.

A steamer was dispatched with a customs officer on board to survey the river and to locate the port at the nearest practical point to Ping Yang. While this work was going on the chief commissioner was informed by Yuan that the Viceroy Li would not permit a port to be opened at that place. The chief commissioner, humiliated by this unjust and unwarrantable interference, was compelled to direct the vessel with the customs officer to return. At first the King declined to believe that such an order could emanate from the viceroy, but direct communication with the Chung Tang through myself confirmed the statement of China's representative. In the discussion of this subject the viceroy based his objection upon the erroneous and illogical grounds that, as Ping Yang is near the port of New Chwang in China, an open port there would seriously interfere with Chinese trade. In the first place, New Chwang is several hundred miles from Ping Vangand; secondly, there is not annually a thousand dollars' worth of trade carried on between the two points.

But if there were even $1,000,000 worth, or ten for that matter, are the revenues of the Corean Government entitled to no consideration by China? or was it the object of the Peking Government in getting control of the customs service of Corea to so direct and manipulate it as to make the natural resources and wealth of the country subserve the interests of China instead of Corea? The right of every state to increase its wealth, population, and power by opening ports for the stimulation and encouragement of trade, the extension of its navigation, the improvement of its revenues, arts, agriculture, and commerce is incontrovertible and is recognized by every civilized nation under the sun, and the sooner China is compelled to recognize the fact also the better it will be for the family of nations whose comity and friendship she essays to share, as well as for her own interests. Neither do the commands of the viceroy stop at opening ports, for his excellency asserts, without a stammer or a blush, that Corea can not negotiate loans with which to aid in the development of the natural resources of the country or transact in her own way, as she has for centuries past, the business of the Government without first asking and obtaining the consent of China.

In view of such a long train of cruel, unjust, and tyrannical conduct as is here presented China's professions of friendship for Corea under the claim of vassalage become simply monstrous in their sincerity. Nor do the mischievous consequences of such meddlesomeness stop here. For if the viceroy in his commands to the Corean Government can practically defeat the commercial part of the treaties made with other countries, his excellency can by similar commands nullify every stipulation of those agreements, whether they apply to the appointment of public ministers, opening ports for the convenience of trade, the collection of duties, or to the rights of citizens and subjects of the treaty powers, whether of person or property. How long the treaty rights of other countries and the lives of their nationals are to be jeopardized and trifled with, or how far China will be permitted to go in the direction she now seems to be headed before a halt is called, depends entirely upon the faith and value other powers besides the United States attach to their stipulations with Corea. I say other powers besides the United States because that Government, with no political interests in the peninsula to protect, has through their distinguished Secretary of State, having in mind the faith pledged in the first article of the American treaty, informed China that as the former has concluded a treaty of friendship and commerce with Corea on the basis of a sovereign and independent state they expect the rights and privileges so acquired to be respected.

Were the national autonomy of China endangered or the rights and immunities of her subjects threatened with destruction by the continued independence of Corea, and China were for that reason to proceed openly to annex the country instead of assuming relations with it which do not exist and endeavoring by false pretenses to sustain the assumption, the case would be different. For the right of self-preservation is just as inherent in a nation as it is in individuals, while the most solemn and responsible obligation it owes to its people is the guaranty of all their rights under a stable and well-administered government.

The King having appointed and dispatched public ministers to all countries in treaty relations with Corea—a course so fatal to the claims of vassalage—the time has surely come for China to quit masquerading with the Corean question and frankly announce in unmistakable terms her policy toward the Peninsula. For until the question is settled one way or the other it will not only continue, as now, to be a very serious and disturbing element in the politics of the East, but it will delay, if not prevent, internal development and the reformation of the long-established abuses in Corea.

But with the question settled in favor of the continued independence of the country and entire responsibility for the duties and obligations already assumed through the government's international agreements, and with labor made honorable by royal decree, and idleness condemned as it is in Western countries, where the fact is recognized that the only key to real greatness, permanent prosperity, and national strength lies in the recognition of the truth that to engage in all branches of labor and business enterprises is not only respectable but it is more, it is laudable and worthy of the highest commendation and encouragement. Then with the idle Yang Ban classes (so-called gentlemen) which are now feeding upon and exhausting the labor of the country, because it is considered dishonorable for them to do any work, compelled to earn the bread they eat, and the agricultural classes stimulated and encouraged by the protection of their surplus products from the squeezing and other illegal exactions now made upon it—sure to follow sooner or later under settled political conditions—Corea would then enter upon that era of prosperity which the natural wealth of the country so justly merits.

A few words in reply to the stale charge that the King is weak and vacillating in character and I leave the subject of Corea's sovereignty and grievances to those who are able to protect and right them; and upon this point two years' experience as His Majesty's foreign adviser and vice-president of the home office (privy council) should enable me to speak advisedly, for during that time some of the most trying phases of the Corean problem have presented themselves for solution, and through them all the King has shown a firmness, cheerfulness, and patience worthy of a ruler of a great nation. Often his language and bearing have indicated great anxiety, but never weakness nor anger. It is true that since Corea's contact with Western people, dazzled by the glitter and novelty of the change and encouraged by the smooth words of some adventurers and some unscrupulous persons, the Government have been led into undertaking impracticable ventures, whose failures have created a reputation for extravagance and fickleness which will perhaps take years of prudence and economy to remove; but every Asiatic nation has had to pass through such an experience, and Corea must have hers also.

After dispatching the ministers to Europe and America against the imperial protests of China, the King ought not to be longer accused of either fear or a want of firmness of character. His Majesty received the protest with that quiet dignity which had characterized his bearing in other important matters, and after hearing and carefully weighing China's objections—relying on his right as expressed in and guarantied by the treaties, as well as by the law of nations—the ministers were ordered to leave for their respective posts, against the ultimatum of the Peking Government, the positive conditions prescribed by the viceroy, as well as in the face of the blustering conduct and diplomatic antics of Commissioner Yuan, supplemented by the persistent efforts of a few cowardly Corean officials, whose well-beaten track between the palace and the Chinese legation indicate the character of their patriotism as well as their devotion to the King. No; from my own knowledge I should rather say that His Majesty is far too strong a character to suit those whose purposes it serves not to have it so.

It must be borne in mind also that His Majesty has no kingdom to gain through an arrogant exhibition of strength of character, but he has one to lose through an exhibition of weakness or fear. The King's character for universal kindness may have been mistaken for weakness. Even some of his subjects say His Majesty is too kind for the good of the public service. His habits are those of perfect sobriety and industry, and, being progressive in his nature, he is constantly seeking information which will aid him in directing his subjects into those paths that lead to the higher plains of civilization which have done so much to humanize and Christianize the western world. Unfortunately in this great work the King, with a few exceptions, stands alone. Those who are in sympathy with western progress are as a rule without influence or following, while those who possess both adhere to the traditions of the past with a loyalty worthy of better things. Under these circumstances the King of Corea surely deserves the sympathy and support of all good people.

O. N. DENNY.

SEOUL, COREA, February 3, 1888.

Since writing the foregoing another disturbance has taken place in Seoul (June 20), but on a different tack from those which have preceded. This time it was substantially the old and absurd story of the Tien-Tsin butchery of innocent people over again that produced the riots, namely, that children were stolen and sold to foreigners, who used their eyes for medicine and then eat their bodies. These wicked rumors so excited the people that all that was necessary was for some street loafer, perhaps employed for the occasion, to cry out "there goes one of the child stealers," when the victim was at once set upon, stoned, and beaten to death, although his only offense may have been leading his own child by the hand through the streets.

The King took prompt and effective measures for the suppression of these rumors as well as the rioters, measures in which His Majesty received the energetic aid of the foreign representatives, backed by the cordial support of their naval authorities.

The appearance in the capital of squads of marines, landed from the American, Russian, and French men-of-war then in Chemulpo harbor, produced a most salutary effect in the direction of law and order. The circumstances leading up to the riots so pointed themselves that the diplomatic representatives in their conferences did not deem it necessary to have the Chinese representative present, so he was wisely left out. Another significant circumstance is that, while charges were freely made against the Japanese of buying and selling children to Westerners for the purposes above named, yet no such accusations were laid at the door of the Chinese, notwithstanding the well-known fact that at least one Chinese merchant has for a long time been engaged in the traffic of buying and shipping out of the country for sale Corean children. These rumors worked so well that no doubt similar ones will again be put in circulation when the conditions seem favorable for more mischief. There does not seem to be any doubt in the minds of intelligent foreigners in Seoul, who have closely observed events for the past two years, as to whose dastardly hand is at the bottom of this business or upon whom the responsibility would fall in case of violence, if the people in the country come to Seoul, as they have threatened to do, for the purpose of killing foreigners and tearing down their houses. Neither need the projector of the foul murders recently committed in the streets of the capital think for a moment that intelligent Coreans are deceived, for they, too, understand perfectly who is the moving spirit and the objects aimed at.

O. N. D.

Mr. MITCHELL. I now move a reference of the pending resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

Mr. FRYE. I move that Senate Executive Document No. 176, Fiftieth Congress, first session, being the message from the President of the United States, transmitting a treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington, February 15, 1888, be reprinted. The print is entirely out.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GRAY. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as section 6.

Mr. PLUMB. I now call for the completion of the reading of section 6, which I think was stopped at the end of the paragraph commencing in line 57.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations as section 6, commencing with line 37, page 8, and continued to line 48, as follows:

The board is authorized to make all needful and proper investigations, experiments, and tests, to ascertain with a view to their utilization by the Government, the most effective guns, projectiles, fuses, torpedoes, armor-plates, and other implements and engines of war; and are hereby authorized to purchase or cause to be manufactured such guns, carriages, armor-plates, and other war materials and articles as may, in their judgment, be necessary in the proper discharge of the duty herein devolved upon them: Provided, That the amount expended and liabilities incurred in such investigations, experiments, and tests shall not exceed $500,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator from Kansas propose an amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. I want to propose an amendment to the paragraph just read. I move to insert in line 40, after the word "fuses," the word "explosives," so as to authorize the board to experiment with explosives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 40, section 6, of the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, after the word "fuses," it is proposed to insert "explosives;" so as to read:

The board is authorized to make all needful and proper investigations, experiments, and tests, to ascertain with a view to their utilization by the Government, the most effective guns, projectiles, fuses, explosives, torpedoes, armor-plates, and other implements and engines of war.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to strike out in line 41 the word "are," and insert in lieu thereof "the Secretary of War is;" so as to read:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to purchase or cause to be manufactured, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to insert after the word "judgment," in line 44, the words "of said board;" and in connection with the same amendment I move to strike out "their," and insert "the," in the same line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In line 44, before the word "judgment," it is proposed to strike out "their" and insert "the;" and after the word "judgment" in the same line to insert "of said board;" so as to read:

In the judgment of said board, be necessary in the proper discharge of the duty herein devolved upon them.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not observe whether the Secretary read the last paragraph in the proposed section 6, commencing with line 49.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has not yet been read. The Secretary will read the remainder of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as section 6.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment from line 49 to line 54, as follows:

That under the provisions of this section of this act the board shall not expend or enter into contract or contracts involving the Government in an aggregate expenditure exceeding $6,000,000, nor an expenditure on the part of the Government in any one fiscal year in excess of $2,000,000.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that the words "of this act," in the first line, should be stricken out. They are unnecessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 49, after the word "section," it is proposed to strike out the words "of this act;" so as to read:

That under the provisions of this section the board shall not expend, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to insert at the close of the paragraph:

And all guns and materials purchased under authority of this act shall be of American production and furnished by citizens of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Kansas another amendment in this paragraph from line 49 to line 54. Has that been read?

Mr. PLUMB. It has been read and amended, and I was going to propose another amendment there so as to make it read:

That under the provisions of this section there shall not be expended.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is exactly what I intended to propose. It says:

The board shall not expend or enter into contract or contracts involving the Government, etc.

I propose to say that "the contracts authorized by the provisions of this section shall not involve the Government in an aggregate expenditure exceeding $6,000,000." Is that the idea of the Senator?

Mr. PLUMB. That is the idea; only I intended to do it by a different form of language, to make the clause read:

That under the provisions of this section there shall not be expended, or contract or contracts entered into involving the Government in an aggregate expenditure exceeding $6,000,000.

That covers the idea of the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the clause so that it shall read as follows:

That under the provisions of this section there shall not be expended, or contract or contracts entered into involving the Government in an aggregate expenditure exceeding $6,000,000, nor an expenditure on the part of the Government in any one fiscal year in excess of $2,000,000.

Mr. REAGAN. To what section is that amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. In the clause from line 49 to 54 of section 6 on page 8. That does not change the sense of the section.

Mr. REAGAN. That is in addition.

Mr. PLUMB. In addition to all the provisions contained prior to section 6.

Mr. BECK. Read it again. I could not understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will again be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the clause beginning in line 49 so as to read as follows:

That under the provisions of this section there shall not be expended, or contract or contracts entered into involving the Government in an aggregate expenditure exceeding $6,000,000, nor an expenditure on the part of the Government in any one fiscal year in excess of $2,000,000; and all guns and materials purchased under the authority of this act shall be of American production and furnished by citizens of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to amend section 6, in line 39, by inserting, after the word "effective," the words "small-arms and cartridges." I understand there is no objection on the part of the committee to the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I think on the whole that will change the effect of the remaining portion of the provision. If the Senator would insert, after the word "guns," in line 39, the words "including small-arms," I think it would be better.

Mr. TELLER. "And cartridges."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado modify his amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. The word "cartridges" is covered by the word "projectiles," in line 40.

Mr. HAWLEY. Hardly.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I suggest that the word "cartridges" come in at a different place. Say "including small-arms," and then put the word "cartridges" in another place.

Mr. HAWLEY. If you say simply "small-arms, cartridges, and projectiles," that will answer every purpose.

Mr. TELLER. I will modify it in that way, by inserting the words after the word "guns" instead of after the word "effective."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 39 of section 6, after the word "guns," it is proposed to insert "including small-arms and cartridges."

Mr. PLUMB. Leave out the word "including," and say "small-arms, cartridges," etc.

The SECRETARY. After the word "guns," in line 39, insert "small-arms, cartridges;" so as to read:

The most effective guns, small-arms, cartridges, projectiles, fuses, explosives, torpedoes, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the remainder of the section proposed to be inserted as section 6, beginning in line 55, as follows:

For payment of the necessary expenses of the board, including a per diem allowance to each member thereof when employed on duty away from his permanent station of $2.50 a day, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment to insert, as a new section, section 6 as it has been amended.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to offer a further amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to offer a further amendment to section 6?

Mr. TELLER. I desire to offer a substitute for this section, and I presume it should be done now.

I do not mean to detain the Senate at this time with any lengthy remarks on this bill, because it is not a subject that I feel that I have any right to detain the Senate at great length upon; but I wish to criticise very briefly some provisions of section 6.

I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose and object of the section, and that is to enable those who are skilled in the making of guns to become contractors with the Government for the furnishing of guns. I believe that it is unquestionably the fact that if we resort to outside people for these arms we shall get a more effective and cheaper gun than the Government can furnish. I think, without any reflection on the War Department, or the Ordnance Bureau, or anybody, the effort to get guns has demonstrated the fact that we are not likely, within any reasonable time in which it is supposed we should have these guns, to get anything very valuable from that source. I do not know whether the complaint made against the Ordnance Bureau is correct or not, but I know the public have at least formed the opinion that nothing will pass that bureau unless it originates in the bureau, and that the public at large will offer nothing to the Government in the way of guns unless there is some board or some authority outside of the Ordnance Bureau with which they can deal.

I do not feel myself that the constitution of this board is what it ought to be. I think there should have been some members of the board taken from civil life, as I said yesterday. I am satisfied that a little of the common sense and the skill and the learning that could be selected from eminent engineers in this country, who have given no attention whatever up to this hour to guns, would be of vast benefit to the Government in connection with this matter. It is a question, as I said yesterday, largely of engineering, and it is quite possible, indeed quite probable, that men who have not had anything to do with guns, who will now make that subject a study for a few months or a year or two, will know more about it than some men who have got in a rut and insist upon keeping in that particular rut and going in that particular direction or else not going at all.

If this is a practical measure, if it is proposed to get guns, this provision is so indefinite, so uncertain, that I do not believe any person will attempt to build a gun unless it is those guns that are provided for in section 6, the cast-iron guns. I have no doubt they can be furnished. Whether they are desirable or not I do not design now to consider or discuss. I presume those will be furnished, because there are concerns in the country that are capable of doing it.

But as to the breech-loading guns of steel, 10 and 12 inch guns, it does not seem to me possible that any concern can go to work and make one of those guns and submit it to the test that the Army may exact and ought to exact without knowing what he is to have for it when he gets it, without knowing the amount that will be paid for it, without knowing what sort of a gun the Department will assent to be the best kind, without any data whatever as to what is to be the weight of the gun, what is to be the weight of the projectile, what is the force that is to be put upon the projectile, what is to be the velocity with which the projectile is to go from the gun, what is to be the range, what is to be the endurance, and what the general character of the gun provided for in this sixth section. Is it left to the board? If it is, does anybody know that it will be satisfactory to Congress? Ought we not to provide in this system for securing proper guns? Ought we not to say something about the character of guns and what should be their effective force?

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will allow me at that point, I will say that I think if he will read the clause beginning in line 19 of section 6 he will find that we have provided for just that thing, because we say in effect that the board shall provide a test; that is, that they shall establish the qualities and qualifications of the gun which, according to their judgment, inferentially but necessarily, represents the highest offensive and defensive results, and when they have prescribed those tests, then manufacturers who desire to make guns to meet those tests will have an opportunity to bring them forward and subject them to the tests and inspection necessary, and if they come up to the tests they shall be entitled to a contract for the manufacture of a certain number.

After the examination I have given to this subject during the last two or three years and in connection with bills of this kind which have been proposed and which have not become laws, I have made up my mind that the law ought not to prescribe in detail the tests to be applied in order to secure the acquisition of good guns.

The situation changes from day to day and from time to time. Suppose we say that a projectile should have a muzzle velocity of a certain number of feet to the second, or something of that kind, and the very next day or before the gun could be made somebody else makes a gun with a greater velocity of projectile, or we might put that velocity too great. We have prescribed a board, which is supposed to represent, as I think it does, everything that is effective in our present military establishment, and we say to them "you shall make tests covering efficiency, range, power, accuracy, and everything of that kind, and when you have prescribed those tests if anybody will produce such a gun you go on and contract with him."

Mr. TELLER. That is true. There is a very limited provision of that kind in this bill, and that is in the first part of section 6. The first provision is that there is to be a comparative test between the iron guns which are to be furnished and the Sandy Hook iron mortar. Then it provides further, when you come to the 10 and 12 inch breech-loading steel guns, that—

Such gun shall, in the presence of the party presenting it, be subjected to such tests as the board shall have prescribed; and should such gun be shown to the satisfaction of the board by such tests to fulfill the requirements previously prescribed in respect to accuracy, range, power, endurance, and general efficiency, the gun and ammunition shall be paid for at a fair valuation, including cost of transportation, and contract shall be made, at a price reasonable in the opinion of the board, with the party presenting the best of such guns, for a further supply of similar guns, to be subjected to the usual service test before acceptance, the experimental gun and all guns purchased hereunder to be subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture, as follows, namely: For not less than fifty 10-inch steel guns; and for not less than fifty 12-inch steel guns.

That is all well enough if only one person presents himself to this board with a gun; but suppose a dozen men present themselves with guns; suppose a dozen men try to make guns. I will admit that I do not think there will be any danger of a great number of people applying, for it does not seem to me upon an examination of the provisions of the bill and the circumstances which surround the dealing with the Government in these matters that anybody will present himself. But what we ought to do is to so provide by law as that there shall be a general offering of guns that the Government may have the advantage of all the best talent in the country in the making of guns.

In the first place, the board will prescribe the test, but, as I understand, they will not prescribe the price to be paid. That is a subject-matter they are not required to provide in advance. Who is going to make a gun and bring it to the Government to test it in the hope that he will get a contract when he does not know whether he will get a contract at all, and if he should obtain a contract he does not know what price will be fixed on the gun, and when fixed it may be such a sum that he would not be willing to make it at that price?

An experimental gun, a gun that has to be tested, can not be made and tested, I suppose, for any sum less than from $100,000 to $125,000. Nobody could afford to make but one gun for $125,000. As was stated here, I think by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and others, it will require a very large expenditure of money to make a gun. In the first instance, there is a large plant to be provided, costing from a million to a million and a half or two million dollars to begin with. What concern will put up the plant and go to all that expense to produce one gun as a test in the hope that it may then get from the Government a contract for one hundred more? If one company should consent to do it another may, and then the two companies would both be coming here and but one of them could get the contract.

Then whoever gets the contract must depend entirely upon this board. As I said before, there is no provision in the bill as to what shall be the size of the projectiles, the weight of the gun, the length of the gun, or anything of that general character. All that is absolutely essential. I know the Senator from Kansas says that the board will have the whole matter under consideration and that they will be required to pay a fair compensation for the gun. Who will determine what is a fair compensation? Of course the board will determine what will be a fair compensation.

The first one hundred guns that are made by any foundry ought to cost more than the second hundred guns. I should say roughly, without a careful examination, that the one hundred and fifty guns which follow the first hundred guns ought not to cast any more than the Government will be obliged to pay for the first one hundred guns, or somewhere in that neighborhood. When they have their plant and have made one hundred guns then they will be prepared to make another hundred or a hundred and fifty very much cheaper than they made the first hundred.

Yesterday the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] made some allusion to the cost of these guns. The cost of the guns is simply enormous; it is frightful to contemplate when you think about it. Some of these guns cost half a million dollars—not the guns provided for in this bill, I think, but some of the guns proposed by the different nations of the earth, and some that are in process of construction, the 20-inch guns, for instance.

I find in a communication from Charles S. Smith, captain, Ordnance Department, United States Army, to the subcommittee on the fortification bill in the House of Representatives, a statement of all the prices that are paid for these guns in Europe. It was desired to purchase some tools, which it was said by the ordnance officer would cost in Europe about $200,000, and he declared that for all purposes in this country the same number of tools would require twice that amount, or $400,000.

There are no people in the world who have excelled us in the making of tools. We make tools of all kinds. A man can make tools with a certainty of a market if he makes them for the Government under contract. It is not a question of trial; it is not a question of test; it is not a question of discretion in the board. He makes them according to their description, according to their demand, and he has a certain sale for his tools.

Why should it be said that twice as much would be required to pay for the tools here as it would take to buy them in Europe? Yet when it comes to guns this Army officer says the guns can be obtained here for practically the same amount of money that they can be obtained for in Germany. If these estimates are true it would be much cheaper to buy the guns in the United States than to buy them in Germany, because the cost of transportation would be great.

I find that this officer says that for a 14-inch gun the price in this country ought to be $93,632; that for a 16-inch gun it ought to be $144,000, and for a 20-inch gun $289,000. I find on the other page, speaking of a 16-inch gun in Krupp's manufactory, he says:

The reported cost of ten Krupp 120-ton guns (16-inch) is given as 894,000 francs, or $174,440 per gun.

Yet the same officer puts the cost of our 16-inch guns delivered at $144,000, and it is to be presumed that the cost of the 12-inch guns and the 10-inch guns will be proportionately lower than the 10-inch and 12-inch guns made in Europe. I have here a memorandum showing that the 12-inch Krupp gun cost fifty-three thousand six hundred and some odd dollars. This Army officer says that a reasonable price for one of those guns here would be $55,000. There is not anybody who does not know that that is impossible; that if those guns are properly constructed in this country they must cost more money than they cost in Germany by very much more than he suggests.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator to repeat the figures he gave as to a 12-inch gun.

Mr. TELLER. Fifty-three thousand six hundred and some dollars is given as the cost of a 12-inch Krupp gun. I have a memorandum here showing that the Krupp 12-inch rifle, which is a gun of higher power than is contemplated in the bill, cost about $53,000. I find in the report of the Army board of 1886 that the cost is put at almost $54,000. It is considered that $55,000 apiece, therefore, is a liberal price for the proposed 12-inch guns.

I was looking this morning over the difference in prices, as published in the labor report, between the German iron works and our own, and I find that we pay more than twice as much for labor in all our steel and iron manufactories as is paid in Germany. I have no doubt that Mr. Krupp employs the very best of workmen, and he probably pays something higher than is paid for ordinary work. Perhaps the difference would not be as great as that, but everybody must know that if a gun cost practically $54,000 in Germany, it can not be built in this country for $55,000.

It is not a matter of particular concern now how much these guns will cost, and I do not mention this for the reason that there is anything in the bill about the cost of them, but to show that when any outside parties come to deal with the War Department they will be met with a statement that these guns can be made for this sum of money, and there will not be anybody who is capable of gathering together enough steel to build a gun in this country, who has the brains or capital to do it, who will not know that it can not be done; and so practically the War Department or the Ordnance Bureau, which is in control now practically of this board, will prevent anybody from contracting with the Government for these guns, because they will insist beforehand that the prices shall be such that nobody will dare to bid; and if they did not, if they said nothing more than that, here is the statement that has gone out to the world, and that will be considered a fair price for a 12-inch gun.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. My understanding is that a 12-inch gun weighs 50 tons, that is 50 long tons, 2,240 pounds to the ton.

Mr. GORMAN. Fifty-one tons.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, in round numbers. That would make about 112,000 pounds, and at 33 cents a pound would amount to over $33,000. We were advised by the Ordnance Bureau that there should be added for finishing and assembling (saying nothing now, of course, about the use of the plant) about 20 per cent., which would make a 12-inch gun cost somewhere between $45,000 and $50,000.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I happen to have a memorandum of the cost of steel guns in my hand, which I will read.

Mr. PLUMB. Well.

Mr. GORMAN. The memorandum was furnished by the ordnance officers. I do not believe it to be accurate by any means; but their estimate is that an 8-inch gun will cost finished at the Government factory $16,000. The probable cost of the same gun finished at a private shop they put at $18,512. A 10-inch gun finished at the Government factory costs $33,000, and it would cost $36,826 at a private factory. A 12-inch gun costs $54,000 at the Government factory, and it would cost $60,222 at a private factory. As a matter of course, in making that estimate of the cost at the Government factory, there is nothing added for the interest on the cost of the plant or for the wear and tear of the machinery. The table as furnished is as follows:

Cost of steel guns.

Caliber.	Weight of finished gun.	Weight of forgings per gun.	Estimated cost per ton.	Cost per gun.	Probable cost per gun finished at gun factory.	Probable cost per gun finished at private shops.
	Tons.	Tons.
8-inch.....	14.5	17.4	$656.32	$11,420	$16,000	$18,512
10-inch.....	29.5	36.0	716.80	25,805	33,000	36,826
12 inch.....	51.0	60.0	739.20	44,352	54,000	60,222

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say further in regard to the price that the Navy Department have been buying steel from the Bethlehem Iron Works, I understand, for about 33 cents a pound for the 6 and 8 inch guns they have been manufacturing, and perhaps for the larger caliber. The Secretary of the Navy told me some twelve months ago, unless I am very much mistaken, that he anticipated within a brief time we should be able to buy our steel as cheaply as the French Government was buying the same article for, and that was about 22½ cents or 23 cents a pound.

Mr. TELLER. How much would that be for a gun?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know; I have not made the calculation. Of course the Senator must know that as our manufacturers become familiar with this kind of manufacture and get the machinery necessary for the purpose the price will naturally go down. There will be very soon competition growing up, because we are not only going to manufacture our guns, but I have very good reason to believe that there are men in this country expecting to engage in the manufacture of guns for foreign governments, for the South American governments especially, and I will venture to say that the moment we offer inducement enough to get our manufacturers enlisted in this kind of manufacture they will seize upon it and fill the field as completely and as economically as they have ever filled the field for the manufacture of steel rails.

If the Senator believes we are not likely to be liberal here to these people, that is another thing, but he will see that we have excluded the idea in the amendment of comparison with anybody, and that we simply authorize the board to buy at a fair valuation. Of course I do not know what they may consider to be a fair valuation, but we thought for the purposes of this experiment we would let them consider every element that entered into the actual cost of a gun that was produced, whether it was just as much cost as might be expected to follow the subsequent production of a thousand, but to get somebody to start in upon this manufacture, if he would, upon the prospect of simply a reasonable profit, to be determined by the board.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that when gun-making becomes a business in this country we shall probably be able to make guns reasonably cheap; but we do not make any guns yet. Our manufacturers have never had any market for guns; they have never had any inducements to make guns. I want somebody to have an inducement to build a gun. I want our people to have their attention called to it; and when they begin to look about to see whether they will put their money together and create a plant, I want them to have something before them by which they may know what kind of a gun they have got to build, what its test is to be, and all about it; and that ought to be the very highest type of any gun in the world. We ought not to accept to-day any 12-inch gun that does not perform as good service as any other gun in the world.

If we can not make as good a gun in this country as Krupp can make, then we ought to go over there and buy from Germany a gun. But we can make as good a gun; there is not any question about it. It is only a question whether there is sufficient inducement offered to the manufacturers of this country to build guns.

I have no expectation that the War Department will ever build any sufficient quantity of guns or that they could do so. The statement that these guns can be made for any such money as has been stated is a mere suggestion, for they have never made any of them for that amount. I do not suppose they have ever made a gun that did not cost twice as much as the sum they talk about here. They will not make any guns that will not cost 100 per cent. more than guns made in private establishments, and they will not make them as good, if the private parties are given an opportunity, so that they will be paid for their skill, for their intelligence, and for the discoveries that they will make in gun-making.

That is what we want to do, and that is why there should be a provision of details in this bill. I do not say that this bill should provide for that absolutely, although an amendment I propose to offer does provide for it. I do not say that we should provide the price, or I do not say, as suggested by the Senator, that there should be an absolute test, for instance, as to the velocity of the projectile from the mouth of the gun, which determines the whole question of the value of a gun.

I would say that you must not have a velocity less than a certain amount, say 2,000 feet per second. If we can get that kind of a gun that will stand the test of a sufficient number of shots, we should agree to pay for it so much money, but if in addition to that we can get the manufacturers to bring us a gun that will give a velocity for the same projectile of 2,500 feet per second, we shall have a gun that is infinitely more valuable than the other gun, and for such a gun we ought to pay exactly, as I heard the Senator from Kansas advocating on this floor—that for every knot the speed of a ship is increased we ought to pay, because the ship becomes more valuable although the speed may be increased but a small percentage. If our manufacturers add a quarter to the force of the gun they will have added more than a quarter to its value, they will have doubled it, the Senator says, and sometimes the difference in value would be incalculable. One might be an effective and a valuable gun, and the other might be absolutely worthless.

What we want to do is to get the best possible gun, and that can be done by some wise system of inviting capitalists who have money to put in guns to come in here and compete with each other. What is more, every manufacturer should be induced to compete with himself; that is, when he has made a good gun he should be ever striving to make a better gun. When you have done that you will have all of the ingenuity and all of the talent and all of the capital in this country, backed by the enterprise to furnish the Government with guns.

But I alluded to the price of these guns more particularly to show that there is every reason to believe the War Department, as long as they are allowed to make these guns, if they do not get bids from the public, will not invite the public, and their tests will not be of such a character as to invite the public. They may make a very different gun. They may say to the public, "We want a velocity with an 800-pound projectile of 2,500 feet to the second," and that may be beyond the capacity of anybody in this country, for it has never yet been attained in any portion of the world. They may say that to the manufacturers of the country. Then they may turn around and build a gun that does not have a velocity of more than 1,500 or 1,800 or 2,000 feet per second, and there will be nobody to complain of that.

For that reason this ought to have been done in detail. The committee ought to have sat down and taken time. They had the ability to do it if they had taken the time, but they returned us this bill in very great haste, and, I think, without giving it that attention which they ought to have given to it. Every day guns are being improved on in this country. We have a rifle called the Springfield rifle. I believe the Government has suspended making any more of those.

Mr. GORMAN. They are still made.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the Government has suspended the making of them.

Mr. PLUMB. Every Army supply bill for the last ten years to my personal knowledge has contained an appropriation of $400,000, I think, perhaps on occasions $500,000, for the purpose of continuing the manufacture of Springfield rifles.

Mr. TELLER. I understood that this order was a recent thing, just a few weeks ago.

Mr. PLUMB. In addition to that, the capacity of the establishment at Springfield, where these rifles are made, has been greatly enlarged lately, practically in order to supply the militia under the increased appropriation of $600,000 a year, which is now one of the permanent annual appropriations of the Government to supply the militia of the various States with weapons of war and camp and garrison equipage.

Mr. TELLER. If we are to make an arm, a small arm or a great arm, we ought to make the best. Inferior guns are of no account any more than inferior powder would be. We want the best. If you are going to war, you want the most effective weapon. If you are going to fight on land or on sea, you want the benefit of all the discoveries and all the enterprise of the world, and we certainly know to-day that a better gun can be made than the Springfield rifle. The Senator knows that.

Mr. GORMAN. They have a better gun in the Navy, I understand, with a smaller caliber. The whole tendency of the world is to make guns of very much smaller caliber than formerly. They have such a gun in the Navy, but not in the Army. They adhere to the Springfield rifle in the Army.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that recently a trial was made down here at the navy-yard in the presence of Senators, at which it was demonstrated that a small rifle capable of being carried had three times the penetration of a Springfield gun. I have a statement here which I believe could be supported by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who, I understand, was present when it was made. I understand that the Springfield rifle tried at the time penetrated 13 inches of pine, and the Hurst rifle 40 inches and had sufficient force to bend and upset the projectile against the iron beyond, and that it would undoubtedly have gone through several more inches if there had been plank there instead of iron. The Springfield projectile weighed 405 grains; the Hurst projectile weighed 258 grains. The Springfield rifle has a danger space of less than 400 yards; the Hurst rifle has a danger space of over 800 yards. The Springfield rifle has an extreme range of about a mile and a half; the Hurst rifle has an extreme range of 3 miles with a much lighter projectile. Mr. President, can anybody make a comparison between those guns that could be favorable to the Springfield rifle? Why, you could not afford to take the Springfield rifle as a gift, and what is true of a rifle is true of a cannon.

Mr. PLUMB. But let me say that is not the only test to be applied to an arm. It must have ease and simplicity of operation; it must be durable; it must be good all around as well as good in the mere matter of its power of propulsion. I do not know that this particular weapon has not all the qualities which a weapon ought to have; but it seems to me that it has not yet been thoroughly investigated. Meanwhile there has been very particular testimony from competent people showing that the Springfield rifle, taking it altogether, in view of all these qualities, is one of the very best weapons in the world, provided always that the present weight of projectile must be kept up. Meanwhile the European governments have been experimenting with a smaller projectile, and I think now it is very generally agreed upon by military authorities that there ought to be a gun for the arming of our Army which has a projectile having a less weight than the Springfield rifle carries. I have no doubt that we shall enter upon the manufacture of something of that kind after a time. Meanwhile we are doing what may or may not be the very best thing, and yet at the same time the military authorities recommend it.

Mr. TELLER. I only mentioned it as an illustration. I did not mean to say that the Hurst rifle ought to supersede the Springfield rifle; but these are important matters. It is no heavier than the Springfield rifle, I understand, but its recoil is much less than is allowed in the British army. Of course that is to be considered. Its recoil might be so great as to render it impossible for a man to hold it; it might fly out of his arm.

Mr. PLUMB. There is one other thing to be taken into account. The Hurst rifle, from what I have heard of it, is undoubtedly a very good weapon, at least in this one particular, but it has been generally believed for some time that we were to have a better explosive than powder. I understand that the British Government has adopted or is about to adopt—at all events it has passed through certain stages necessary to the adoption—an explosive which is a great deal better than anything heretofore known for small-arms; that it is impervious to water; that water does not affect it injuriously; that one-half the weight of this explosive will perform more than the service of double the weight of powder, and so on. Of course all these things may qualify the arm to be used.

Mr. TELLER. It is all true, of course, as the Senator from Kansas says, that discoveries are being made all the time, and that is why I suggested that if we made the proper inducement for manufacturers we should have their efforts in making discoveries, because we would pay them. If a man knows that he can get $50,000 from the Government for a rifle of a certain character, and that he can get $10,000 more from the Government for his skill, he is going to try to make the superior gun. That is why I want a system that shall tell the people what kind of a gun they can make, and which shall provide that when they have made what is admitted to be the best gun, we shall buy that gun; and if a man comes then with a better gun that it shall supersede his own gun if it is better than the former.

I have here an amendment which is somewhat lengthy, which I desire to offer so that if it shall not meet the approval of the Senate it may at least go with the bill into conference, so that the Senate conferees may have the benefit of what I think are some very valuable provisions. The amendment has been prepared by some gentlemen with great care and attention, and while there are some things in it that I do not know ought to go into the bill, some things I admit I am not familiar enough with the subject to really know whether they ought to go into it, on the whole it seems to me to be a complete and perfect provision, and I believe if the Senate would adopt it instead of the sixth section the bill would then be in a very much better condition in handling this subject, and I believe there would then be some hope that we might get a bill through Congress.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to some of the provisions of the amendment, not in detail, but just for a moment. It provides that the standard weight for projectiles for testing these guns shall not be less than 500 and 800 pounds respectively; that the standard weight of the rifle shall be so much, and then it provides a great many other things. Every gun ought to be tested according to its projectile. That is to say, if one gun carries a projectile of 800 pounds and another carries one of 1,200 pounds, there might be a very great difference, the gun that fired the 800-pound projectile might be the most valuable after all. All these details ought to be worked up. Of course, the board may do it, it is possible they will do it, and that they will provide for that, although the bill itself should not have compelled them to provide for it. If the Senate does not think it is wise to say what shall be the length of the gun, what shall be the weight of the gun, what shall be the projectile, what shall be its speed, what shall be the strength of the gun, at least we ought to provide in this bill that the board shall adopt some rules of this kind which shall be permanent and fixed, and not liable to be changed at any time after people enter into the manufacture of these guns. I submit the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment offered as an addition to the section?

Mr. TELLER. It is a substitute for all after the first paragraph of section 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 6 by striking out all after the word "manufacture," in line 18, and inserting:

SEC. 7. That the standard weight for projectiles for testing 10-inch and 12-inch rifle guns shall not be less than 500 and 800 pounds, respectively.

SEC. 8. That the standard weight of rifle guns to be tested for endurance, and of service guns to be contracted for as hereinafter provided, shall not be more than 28 and 48 tons each, respectively, for 10-inch and 12-inch rifles; and the length of these said guns, exclusive of the breech apparatus, shall not exceed 35 calibers.

SEC. 9. That the said board shall authorize a contract, after due advertisement, for two 12-inch rifle guns with such party or parties as shall to them seem best. These guns shall be built up according to the plans now prepared by the War and Navy Departments for 8, 10, and 12 inch rifles, the principal parts being of forged tempered steel. The drawings and specifications for one of these guns shall be furnished by the War Department and for the other by the Navy Department within two months from the passage of this act, or as soon thereafter as may be, and the construction of these guns shall be superintended by officers of the War and Navy Departments, respectively, who shall report progress from time to time, and upon the completion thereof, to the said board. The weights and lengths of these guns shall not exceed that provided for 12-inch rifles in section 8 of this act, and the cost of these two guns, finished and delivered at the place of manufacture, shall not exceed $200,000.

That the said board shall also procure, by purchase or contract, carriages for use in testing these guns, either or both, unless the respective Departments which furnish specifications therefor shall have carriages suitable for such tests. These two guns shall each be tested under the directions of said board for accuracy, range, and endurance in competition with and for comparison with those to be furnished by private parties as hereinafter provided in section 10. The powder and projectiles for testing each of these guns shall be furnished by the Departments which furnish the specifications respectively therefor, and shall be paid for by order of the board The projectiles for these guns shall have the weight of 800 pounds each, and shall be fired with a charge of powder sufficient to give a muzzle velocity thereto of 2,000 feet per second.

These weights and velocities may either vary by the amount of 1 per cent. of that specified, but the average shall not be less than 800 pounds and 2,000 feet, respectively.

These guns may either or both be repaired to an extent not exceeding 10 per cent. of their respective costs, provided such repairs are necessary to secure the endurance of two hundred rounds or more from each. In estimating the cost of repairs the transportation of the guns shall not be included.

That the board may carry out the provisions of this section at a total cost not exceeding $360,000.

SEC. 10. That whosoever shall, within the limitation provided in sections 15, 16, and 17 of this act, produce one or more 10-inch or 12-inch single-charge breech-loading rifle guns of weights and lengths conforming to section 8, which guns are to be made wholly or principally of steel, and each supplied with a carriage, projectiles, powder, implements, ordnance supplies, and including all incidental expenses of a test of two hundred rounds for each test gun so provided, shall, for each test gun so made and so provided which withstands the test of two hundred rounds of projectiles fired with a muzzle velocity of not less than 2,000 feet per second on an average, and an average weight of projectiles of not less than that prescribed for the standard weight of projectiles for such guns in section 10 of this act, without more repairs than can be put upon such guns ordinarily for 10 per cent. of their cost, exclusive of transportation, be paid for the same by the direction of the said board, at a price for such guns, and supplies and tests, not including the carriage, not exceeding double the price hereinafter fixed in this section as the price for service guns of that caliber, which money shall be due and paid as soon as any such gun has withstood the prescribed test of two hundred rounds and it is found it is to be paid for as determined by section 15, which shall be in full payment for such gun and test, including the powder, projectiles, repairs of gun-carriage and gun, and all other expenses of the test not hereinafter specified, except the cost of the carriage therefor, which if found suitable for use therewith shall be paid for at the price hereinafter fixed for carriages for service guns of such caliber by order of the board or its authorized agent.

Payment for any such carriage to be made as soon as the test has shown it suitable for use with such gun or guns as it was made for, and without reference to whether the gun for which it was made endures its test or not.

That no such carriage shall be paid for at any price unless it is found suitable for use with the gun for which it was provided.

That no such test gun, or supplies therefor, provided or furnished for test under the provisions of this section, shall be paid for at any price, unless it shall endure the specified test of firing two hundred rounds with an average weight and velocity of projectiles equal to that specified and without more than the specified amount of repairs.

That all test guns so provided or furnished shall be delivered at the place of manufacture.

That the Government, under direction of the board, shall furnish, free of charge, the use of a proving ground or grounds suitable for testing any or all of these guns for range, accuracy, and penetration, and furnish, free of charge, the necessary targets for accuracy and penetration, the butts to be used in firing for durability, and bear all expenses of handling and transporting the guns.

That for these purpores, and for firing any such guns after they have been fired the first two hundred rounds, the board is authorized to expend the sum of $400,000, to be available on and after July 1, 1890, until expended.

That the plans of the guns of either kind, the breech-loading mechanism, the system of rifling, the projectiles adapted thereto, and the kind of powder or powder and cases therefor, and all cartridges used in these tests, may be of the kinds heretofore approved by the War and Navy Departments, or may be after original designs or plans and proportions satisfactory to the projector and producer; and any gun furnished by any party, and all the supplies therefor, shall be furnished without any cost to the Government until such gun has endured the above prescribed test of firing two hundred rounds of projectiles with the weights and velocities prescribed.

This firing of any such gun shall all be under the joint direction of the parties furnishing the gun and the said board, but the party or parties furnishing any such gun may at any and all times increase the weights of projectiles or charge of powder above the standard prescribed to the extent he or they think best.

That should any gun or more than one gun of any of the calibers specified in this section be furnished which withstands the firing of the said two hundred rounds with the weights and velocities of projectiles specified, then the firing shall continue to determine the endurance of, and which of such guns has the best endurance, such continuance of the firing to be at the expense of the Government, and if either of the said competing guns has, in firing its first two hundred rounds, done less work than the gun or guns it is competing with, by reason of its projectiles having been lighter, or the velocities thereof less than that of the projectiles of the said competing gun or guns, then such gun or guns shall first be fired to the extent necessary to make up double the amount of such deficiency of work performed, before it shall be considered in further competition with the test gun or guns of that caliber which have done the superior amount of work, and in making up this deficiency the gun or guns to be fired therefor shall be fired with such charges of powder and shot, to be proportioned by the producer of the gun, as shall give an amount of work to the projectiles for each discharge equal to the average work of the best or largest amount of work done in twenty fires by the competing gun which it is being equalized with, and this amount of work for each discharge thereafter for endurance shall be required of each competing gun of that caliber, unless the parties furnishing the competing guns of that caliber and the board shall all agree to have the amount thereof reduced. Should the owner or producer of any such deficient gun object to being obliged to make up this deficiency of work done by his or their gun during the first two hundred rounds of firing it, then such gun shall be considered as out of the competitive test, and the firing may go on with the other gun or guns as long as the producer of such gun or guns may desire.

That at any time after any of the test guns which may be provided under the provisions of this act has been fired two hundred rounds, and the above specified amount of firing necessary to make up the excess of work performed in the first two hundred rounds of firing by some competing gun of like caliber, such test gun shall appear clearly to be inferior in endurance to some of its competitors, the board may decline to fire it further, but this shall not prevent the producer of such gun from a further test thereof in the presence of the board at the expense of the producer, and such gun shall still be considered in competition with the other gun or guns of like caliber being fired for endurance by the board; and if it shall excel them in endurance such expense for additional firing shall be borne by the Government and paid by the order of said board.

That after any such test gun of 10-inch or 12-inch caliber has been fired the first two hundred rounds, and such additional amount as is above specified in this section to give it a credit for endurance equal to any of its competitors, for work done in its first two hundred rounds of firing, then all continuation of the firing for endurance for each successive fifty rounds shall be with charges which shall increase the average work stored in each projectile of such fifty fires, by an amount of not less than 5 per cent. of the average work stored in each of the projectiles of the last fifty rounds previously fired from any such gun of that caliber, and this amount of work required of each gun for these fires shall not be reduced except by consent of the board and the unanimous consent of all of the producers of the guns of that caliber then competing; but any one of the competitors may, if he or they desire, increase the charge of either powder or projectiles for their guns. That repairs may be made at the expense of the producer of any of these test guns, to cost not more, if made ordinarily, than 10 per cent. of the cost prescribed to be paid for like guns for service during the first two hundred rounds of firing this test gun, and such additional firing as may be necessary to equalize for endurance the work of this gun, and bring it up to that of its best competing gun of that caliber, as provided in this section; additional repairs may thereafter be put upon any of these test guns to the extent that these repairs, with all previous repairs made after it has been submitted for test, shall not exceed in cost or kind such as could be made ordinarily for 20 per cent. of the price fixed in this act for service guns of their kind and caliber, transportation not being included.

That the time occupied by all repairs made during the first two hundred rounds fired from any test gun shall not exceed four months, except by consent of said board, and all further repairs of said gun which may be made after the firing of the first two hundred rounds shall not exceed four months in all, without the consent of the board, such times for repairs to include the time used in transporting the guns therefor.

That of the projectiles furnished for the first two hundred rounds to be fired from any of these guns, at least twenty, and forty if the board shall require, shall be suitable for range and accuracy, and five of these projectiles for each gun shall, if the board require, be suitable for penetration, and the balance of the two hundred rounds need be suitable for endurance only.

That when the test for endurance of guns, which may be made for test under the provisions of this section, have been completed for the guns of either of the specified calibers, a contract shall be made by order of the said board with that party or parties who shall have made the best 10-inch or 12-inch guns, respectively, which gun or guns has been fired at least two hundred rounds with the prescribed charges, and has shown, by all the tests thereof for endurance and accuracy, made as herein provided, that it is superior to all other competing guns of its class. The contract for these guns to be for fifty of the 10-inch and fifty of the 12-inch, and any and all of these service guns shall be equal in all respects to the trial gun tested, on which test the contract is or may be based. And the said board shall also authorize a contract for a like number of gun-carriages suitable for use for such guns so contracted for, and for a few projectiles for each of said guns. The carriages shall be furnished by the party or parties who furnish the guns for which they are made, provided such party or parties will furnish carriages suitable for use of their guns; and that party furnishing any such service gun shall furnish the projectiles therefor, provided suitable contract can be made with them therefor.

That the prices of said service guns shall be as follows: For 10-inch rifle guns, not to exceed $48,000 each, and for 12-inch rifle guns, not to exceed $75,000 each; and the prices of the carriages for each of these respective guns shall be one-third of the price of the gun for which it is or shall be furnished; the prices of all these guns and carriages shall be modified according to the terms provided in sections 12, 13, and 14 of this act.

That the said board may authorize the expenditure for the proof tests of the service guns and carriages of each class of these 10 or 12 inch rifle guns, for the projectiles for these guns, and for the transportation of the guns, carriages, and projectiles of either class of the guns authorized in this section, a sum not exceeding 10 per cent. of the amount to be paid for all the guns and carriages of either of such classes respectively.

The projectiles for any of these guns may be delivered with them, but shall not be delivered sooner than is the gun for which they are made.

That all carriages furnished for the service 10-inch and 12-inch guns to be provided and furnished as prescribed in this section, shall have, and there shall be furnished therewith and as constituting a part thereof, all engines, machinery, pumps, compressors, pipes and piping, valves, reservoirs, accumulators, and track and bed plates necessary to operate them in the place they are intended to be used; and the said board shall give reasonable notice of the kind of place in which any such service gun is expected to work, so the contractor may be able to furnish a suitable carriage and appliances for the use of such gun in such place; but the contractor shall not be required to furnish with any such gun-carriage appliances complete for more than one kind of mounting with the necessary apparatus therewith for operating the gun for which it is to be made. Thus some guns may be mounted on carriages suitable for use on ships or floating batteries, with the necessary loading and other operating appliances, while others may be mounted on carriages suitable for use in casemates, and others for use behind earthworks and masonry so arranged as to raise the gun at least 12 feet from the position of loading to that required when fired, if the said board shall so require; but the weights for accumulators for use on land need not be made of metal, nor if so made of either metal or masonry need such weights be furnished by the contractor at his expense, nor shall he or they be required to furnish with these gun-carriages any turret work or masonry foundations of any kind whatsoever, or metal work for foundations except the foundation track and bed plate on which the gun-carriage rests and is traversed. When more than one gun is used in close proximity, the engines, pumps, accumulators, compressors, and such other machinery to be furnished with such gun-carriages need not be complete for each gun, but may be made to operate sets of two or more guns to the extent in number the board may think desirable instead of being complete for each separate gun.

For these fifty service 10-inch rifles, and the fifty service 12-inch rifles, their carriages, projectiles, proof-tests, and transportation, the sum of $9,020,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; to be available on and after July 1, 1894, at the rate of $1,500,000 per year, and to remain available until expended.

SEC. 11. That it is herein provided that all guns contracted for as provided in section 10 to be delivered for service, shall be tested at the place or places where built, by the party furnishing the same, or at such other suitable place or places as he or they may provide, with not less than five nor more than ten rounds from each gun, with that charge equal to the maximum charge endured for two hundred rounds in the trial gun on which the contract for the gun of such caliber was made, the Government to furnish an officer to witness such test at the time the party making the gun shall desire. The gun shall endure such tests without more injury than the ordinary wear and tear of such guns should be, or that the ordinary wear and tear of the trial gun of that kind was in firing a like number of rounds of equal energy. The Government shall not accept guns which are seriously injured by this test, or which are injured more than the ordinary wear and tear of such guns, unless the injured parts are replaced or made good, when the gun may be again tested, and must endure the test before it shall be accepted without more injury than ordinary wear and tear that such number of fires shall produce. The powder, cartridges, and projectiles for these tests shall be paid for by the Government at a reasonable price therefor.

SEC. 12. That should any of the test guns of the kind to be contracted for as above provided in section 10 have endured a greater amount of work in firing any two hundred rounds therefrom than that prescribed, namely, two hundred rounds of projectiles of an average weight equal to that provided for such guns in section 7, with a muzzle velocity of 2,000 feet per second, the price of the service guns of that kind to be constructed for as per section 10 shall be increased above the price therein provided, to the extent of the average work done on the projectiles by any such said test gun, on which the contract for service guns may be based, exceeded in firing any two hundred rounds that prescribed, namely, two hundred rounds, of a velocity of 2,000 feet per second, and the weight of projectile equal to that fixed as a standard for such guns in section 7, and the price of the carriages for such service guns shall be increased in the same proportion, which increase of price of such guns and carriages shall be paid by the order of the board, or its authorized agent.

That all service guns, gun-carriages, projectiles, and cartridges therefor may be delivered to the Government at the place or places of manufacture.

SEC. 13. That no service gun to be provided as specified in section 10 of either of the specified calibers shall be accepted unless it appears to be as good in all respects as was the trial gun furnished by the party with whom the contract for such service gun was made. And the party making contracts for any of these service guns shall contract and guarantee that all material used therein shall be equal in quality and workmanship to that provided in the trial gun or guns on which the contract for such service gun was based, and that he or they will institute a thorough system of tests by which they may know that all parts of the guns, as far as may be, are of good material and workmanship in all respects; the delivery of all these service guns to begin two years from the dates of the respective contracts therefor, and continue at such average rate as would complete the delivery in not less than eight years from the date of the respective contracts therefor.

That all service guns and carriages therefor furnished under the provisions of this act shall be paid for at time of delivery, and when delivered later than the dates so fixed shall have the price of the same at which it would otherwise be paid for reduced by a reasonable amount for the time during which such delay of delivery takes place. But they may be delivered sooner.

SEC. 14. That it is hereby provided that at any time during the execution of any contract by any party or parties for 10-inch or 12-inch rifle guns to be made by them under the provisions of this act, such party or parties may furnish a gun of any such caliber as they may have such contract for, which gun may be made after the plans and specifications provided in the original contract for guns of that caliber, or after new plans and specifications to be provided by them, and such gun may be tested by them at their own expense in the presence of an officer who shall be detailed by said board on ordnance; and if such gun shows an endurance of being able to fire two hundred rounds with an average amount of work stored in its projectile when leaving the gun equal to 5 per cent. more than the average of the best two hundred fires selected from the firing of the test gun under which such contract was based, then, in that case, the Government shall pay for such gun and carriage therefor, and the powder and projectiles used in such test, the price of the gun and carriage to be the regular price for such service guns of that caliber, and the carriage therefor, as determined by sections 10, 12, and 13 of this act, and the contractor shall be at liberty to fill any part of the balance of his or their order for guns of that caliber with guns of this new pattern instead of guns made after the original test-gun specifications on which he or they obtained the contract for such guns, and the pay for such substitute guns and carriages therefor shall be modified to the extent the increase of work performed by such last test-gun in the best two hundred rounds fired therefrom exceeds that prescribed, as provided in section 12 of this act.

But not more than two such changes shall be made in the case of the contract for the 10-inch or the 12-inch rifles, respectively, and all such subsequent tests in which the new test gun or guns fail to excel the test gun on which the contracts were made by not giving, for the best two hundred rounds fired therefrom, more than 5 per cent. more work stored in the projectiles when leaving the gun than was given by the best two hundred rounds of the best test gun of that caliber, on which the contract for such guns was based, shall be at the expense of the contractor.

SEC. 15. That it is hereby provided that in the case of the trial guns to be provided for test under the provisions of sections 10, 15, and 16 of this act, that only the best two 10-inch test guns shall be paid for, even though they reach the degree of excellence required.

That it is hereby provided that should more than five 12-inch guns be offered for test under the provisions of sections 10 and 16 of this act which withstand the prescribed test of two hundred fires under the conditions fixed in section 10, or which excel in endurance the said Army or the said Navy gun to be provided as per section 9 of this act, then in that case only the best five of said 12-inch guns provided under the terms of said section shall be paid for, with their carriages, powder, projectiles, and supplies as therein provided, even though they shall have reached the degree of endurance specified; and in selecting the five to be paid for those shall be selected which have the greatest degree of endurance as shown when tested according to rules and provisions made in section 10 of this act.

To carry out the provisions of this section, $1,099,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available on and after July 1, 1892, and until expended.

That the time of paying for any of the test guns to be furnished under the provisions of section 10 is hereby modified to the extent necessary to find out that they are to be paid for consistently with all the provisions of this act.

That at any time during the test of any of these trial guns or carriages the producer thereof may withdraw the same, and in case of withdrawal no payment shall be made therefor.

That all trial guns, gun-carriages, powder, or projectiles furnished for test under the provisions of this act, and not to be paid for, may be withdrawn by the party furnishing the same.

SEC. 16. That it is hereby provided that all 10 and 12 inch rifle guns for competitive trial and tests to be made and tested as provided in this act shall be finished ready for test on or before January 1, 1892: Provided, That if no 12-inch rifle gun made principally or wholly of steel has been completed and offered for test at that time which shall withstand the prescribed test of two hundred rounds then the time for accepting such guns for competitive test as herein provided shall be extended to January 1, 1893.

SEC. 17. The board shall make all reasonable efforts to make all the tests provided for as quickly as possible after any such gun is ready for test; and all the test experiments of guns shall be open to the inspection and observation of all parties furnishing guns of like calibers for test as provided in this act.

That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall each assist this board by detailing any and all officers and men for its use which it may need at any and all times, and by furnishing it, without charge, any and all facilities for testing any and all of the guns and gun-carriages to be provided under this bill to the extent that they are able so to do, and in general to aid the board in any way they can in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 18. That all castings and forgings entering into the construction of the armaments provided for in this act shall be of American manufacture. The board herein provided for shall annually report its operations to the Secretary of War, for submission to Congress, at the beginning of each session, which report shall state in detail the amount expended under each section of this act and the progress made in carrying out its provisions, with such additional information as the board may deem advisable.

SEC. 19. To enable the board or Secretary of War to pay any premium that may become due to parties who may furnish service guns under the provisions of this act the sum of $1,000,000, to be available on and after the fiscal year ending June, 1894, and to remain available until used for this purpose if necessary.

SEC. 20. That section 2 of an act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, approved July 5, 1884, is hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations known as section 6.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to say a word in regard to this provision. It is a very elaborate provision, going far more into detail than I think any legislative provision ought to go. We shall have, when this bill shall pass, a board, comprising the skill and judgment of the Army, which will submit to us, if it becomes necessary to legislate on these propositions, something which we can act upon, I think, more intelligently than we can to-day. It is desirable now to make a start which I fear the adoption of this provision will prevent. I think, therefore, that irrespective of any discussion of its merits it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to add to what the Senator from Kansas has said, as to the general provisions of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, that I think many of them are very wise, and will probably become absolutely necessary to be adopted by Congress if private enterprises decline at any time hereafter to enter largely into the manufacture of guns. But after careful consideration on the committee with my friend from Kansas, I concur with him in saying that at present I do not believe it is possible to go to the extent provided for in the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. I think the board and machinery provided for in the bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations is the best that can be had at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to move an amendment to line 21, page 7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In which section?

Mr. PLUMB. In section 6, after the word "caliber," to insert "and of weight and dimensions to be prescribed by the board."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 21, after the word "caliber," it is proposed to insert the words "and of weight and dimensions to be prescribed by the board."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understood the Senator to say in private conversation that he expects the board will inspect this specimen gun during the process of its manufacture. I do not see how that is provided for.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that is amply provided for on the top of page 8. The Senator will observe that this experimental gun, if it stands the test which has been prescribed for its manufacture by the board, shall be purchased, and he will find that on page 8 of the bill it is provided that the "experimental gun" (by name) "and all guns purchased hereunder" shall be "subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture."

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not see the words "experimental gun" in that connection.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator will find them at the top of page 8.

Mr. HAWLEY. I may have a different print of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I think perhaps the Senator may have the print that was made originally for the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. You refer to the provision reading:

And contract shall be made at a price reasonable in the opinion of the board, with the party presenting the best of such guns, for a further supply of similar guns, to be subjected to the usual service test before acceptance, the experimental gun and all guns purchased hereunder to be subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture.

I see what the Senator means. I had not before seen the expression. I have had another copy of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator has had a copy that was made for the use of the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. The experimental gun is mentioned.

Mr. PLUMB. It says, "The experimental gun and all guns purchased hereunder to be subject to inspection at each stage of manufacture."

Mr. HAWLEY. That is quite right, because they could not tell anything about it unless they inspected it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have an amendment to offer as an independent section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question first is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations as section 6 as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I now offer an amendment to constitute section 7 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill:

SEC. 7. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to alter or repeal existing provisions of law prescribing the duties and powers of any department of the Army.

Mr. HAWLEY. That, Mr. President, is by way of abundant caution, because there are so many provisions here that might seem to differ from what is already laid down in the statutes as to the duties of the different Army departments. I do not wish them to be interfered with, because a body of laws of that kind that have been in existence for nearly a century, many of them for fifty or sixty years, should not be changed without serious consideration. I do not wish the officers to be anxious lest they are interfered with, nor do I wish to interfere with them.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] would destroy the harmony of this bill and reverse all that the Committee on Appropriations, after due consideration, have undertaken to do. That amendment provides that all the money appropriated under this act shall be expended as provided in section 1164 of the Revised Statutes, which says:

It shall be the duty of the Chief of Ordnance to furnish estimates, and, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to make contracts and purchases, for procuring the necessary supplies of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the armies of the United States, etc.

The framework of this bill and the real merit of it—and but for that provision I do not believe it would pass; it certainly would not receive my approval—is that it provides for a board to consist of the general commanding the Army, an ordnance officer, an artillery officer, and an engineer officer to be selected by the Secretary of War, which board shall expend every dollar of the money appropriated by this act, make the test, and carry out all the provisions of the act.

Now, Mr. President, I feel that I am stating the exact fact when I say that that was the unanimous opinion of the committee; that the only way by which we might get out of the rut which we have been in was by making this provision. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] now goes back and practically reverses all that we have done, simply saying that six or eight millions of dollars is hereby appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Ordnance Department.

I find here this morning circulated, not generally but quietly—I have been fortunate enough to get hold of a copy of it—a statement prepared by one of the officers of the Ordnance Department who was before the Committees on Appropriations of both Houses, who was then subjected to a thorough examination, or rather had full and free conference with the committees, who knew and could not but know all the provisions that were intended to be put into this act. When before the committee that officer placed his judgment against that of the General of the Army, who did not hesitate to say that the provision precisely as we have it in the first section, providing for that board and bringing every branch of the service under its direction, is the one mode and probably the only mode by which we will have efficiency, economy, and honest results.

I will say to my friend from Connecticut, taking notice as we are bound to do from the public prints of occurrences elsewhere, and being as anxious as he is to go on with this work of putting our fortifications in proper condition, it would be infinitely better that no appropriation whatever should be made at this session, and I do not believe that it is possible to get so many millions of dollars, or one-half the amount, or one-tenth the amount placed at the disposal of officers who have not accomplished anything in the past twenty years. We have attempted in the committee to raise the question of armament out of that rut and put it in such shape that we may have the experience of four or five officers, the best officers in the service. As the bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an engineer officer, an ordnance officer, an artillery officer, and the commanding general, we were to have the judgment of these men before a single dollar could be expended under this act.

What objection has the Senator to it? Why does he prefer that the Ordnance Department should make these contracts? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asks me what the communication I have is. The subcommittee had before it the general commanding the Army, and Captain Smith, and another ordnance officer, both on duty at the Ordnance Department, and conferred with them fully and freely as to the details of this bill. Each had ample opportunity to make any suggestions he thought proper.

They were consulted about the phraseology of parts of the bill. Whatever objections they had were well considered. The provision giving control of the expenditures of every kind to be made under this act to the board named did not, of course, meet with favor from the Ordnance Office, but it was satisfactory to the general commanding the Army. The committee reported the bill. There was, so far as I know, no official communication whatever from the War Department, but I have found here to-day a private document criticising the bill severely. They assert "that the provision to supplant the services of this (the Ordnance) Department by a hastily devised board is harsh in the extreme, and in the absence of sufficient reason therefor can not be justified as a measure necessary for the public good."

The author of this communication, I have good reason to believe, is Captain Smith, now in charge of the Ordnance Department. He attempts to instruct Congress and to criticise a committee of this body as having reported a measure which is not for the public good! He insists that his board, and his board alone, should have the expenditure of the money appropriated. These officers have the right to express their opinions freely and frankly when called upon by a committee or by resolution, but they have no right to use the Government's money to print documents for private circulation against the passage of any bill that Congress may deem proper or that a committee may formulate.

It is an outrageous attempt to influence legislation, and I will say that I hope the attention of the Secretary of War or of the President will be called to the matter. In my opinion an officer who is engaged in such work ought to be sent away from Washington and placed in some remote part of the Union. I have never known since I have been connected with legislative bodies such an outrageous attempt on the part of subordinate officers. As I have once before stated, these officers are in the corridors and in the galleries during the discussion of these Army bills and they send memorandums into the Senate and use the influence of their position, not to serve the Government, but to the end that $4,000,000 may be placed in their hands to be expended. Ordinarily and in private life it would be regarded as showing too much interest in the large appropriations to be made. The motive must be ascertained. They are not content with sufficient appropriations for the Government shop, but this captain declares that section 6 is in conflict with existing laws. What he desires is to prevent private persons from competing. Why should capable, honest officers fear an open field and honest competition?

I shall ask to have this document, which I brand as an outrage, coming as it does from an officer of this Government, printed in the RECORD, and by the side of it, with the permission of the Senate, I will have printed a report of Colonel Laidley, an officer lately deceased, who was probably the brightest officer in the service, a man who had the courage to differ from those who are now in charge of the Ordnance Department. He takes an entirely different view of the value of cast-iron guns and cast-iron mortars. He takes the view that is embraced in this bill, and as I have never been able to get but one copy of it, I shall ask permission of the Senate to print his statement, so that Senators and members of Congress may have an opportunity to look at it.

Papers are as follows:

No. 1.

COMMENTS ON THE ACT "MAKING APPROPRIATIONS FOR FORTIFICATIONS AND OTHER WORKS OF DEFENSE AND THEIR ARMAMENT, FOR THE PROCUREMENT AND TRIAL OF HEAVY ORDNANCE IN SERVICE, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES."

The provisions of section 1, as they relate to the powers and duties of a proposed Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, is in direct conflict with section 1164 of the Revised Statutes, which makes it the "duty of the Chief of Ordnance to furnish estimates, and, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to make contracts and purchases, for procuring the necessary supplies of ordnance and ordnance stores, for the use of the Army of the United States; to direct the inspection and proving of the same, and to direct the construction of all cannon and carriages, ammunition wagons, traveling forges, artificers' wagons, and of every implement and apparatus for ordnance, and the preparation of all kinds of ammunition and ordnance stores constructed or prepared for said service."

This section has been on the statute-book since February 3, 1815, and is the organic law prescribing the duties of the Ordnance Department under the Secretary of War. This law has thus been in force about seventy-three years, and under a test of two wars has demonstrated by satisfactory working the wisdom of the enactment. No good grounds now exist for its practical abolishment, as proposed in the bill. Under existing law the only duties that could be assigned properly to this board would be of an advisory nature in respect to the duties of the Secretary of War. But it is always competent for the Secretary of War, who is intrusted with the expenditures of the moneys appropriated, to convene such a board, if in his judgment it appears expedient. Such was the course pursued by the Secretary of the Navy with regard to the appropriations for rebuilding the Navy, but no provision to that effect was embodied in the naval appropriation bills. The appointment of an advisory board is more properly a ministerial measure, and should, it is believed, be left to the discretion of the executive department, particularly where, as in the present case, there is a regularly organized and permanent technical department available for the duties required, which may render such a board superfluous, and thus a needless expense.

Section 4: The careful estimates show that it will require $250,000 to erect the necessary shops and permanent fixtures for the construction of guns, inclusive of guns of 12 inches in caliber; for the purchase of the necessary machinery and tools, as lathes, boring mills, planers, rifling machines, cranes, etc.; $550,000 will be necessary in order to fabricate the following quantities of guns per annum, namely, ten 8-inch guns, six 10-inch guns, and four 12-inch guns—a somewhat smaller output than specified in the Gun Foundry Board report. The above foots up to a total of $800,000, to which should be added, for two sets of officers' quarters, $20,000, making an aggregate of $820,000. Under the sundry civil bill about $35,000 was appropriated for gun plant at Watervliet arsenal, and there is on hand available heavy-gun plant at the arsenal, amounting in value to about $35,000, so that the above sum may be reduced by $70,000, or to $750,000. A less sum than $250,000 will not complete the shops, and it is important, for economic reasons, to procure as many of the needed tools at one time as possible. It is equally important in point of time to procure all the needed tools at once. The amount appropriated in section 4 for this purpose, namely, $550,000, is too small.

The estimate of $750,000 required for a gun factory to fabricate guns up to 12-inch caliber is larger than the estimate of the Gun Foundry Board for that purpose. But the estimates of the Gun Foundry Board are much too small, both as respects the number and cost of the necessary tools. This is fully demonstrated by the Navy experience in the establishment of the gun factory at the navy-yard, and it is confirmed by the estimates made by the Army Ordnance Department based on the current market prices for tools so far as they can be obtained.

Section 6 conflicts with section 1164 of the Revised Statutes in that it empowers the board to make contracts and purchases and to direct the proof of ordnance and ordnance stores and the construction of cannon, etc., for issue to the service. The effect of this will be to supersede, to a large extent, the present Ordnance Department and to substitute therefor a newly-constituted board which has not been especially trained for the technical duties performed by the Ordnance Department.

The Ordnance and Fortifications Board proposed in the bill, should it prepare its own designs for guns and ordnance material, would require more than a year's study and investigation for this preliminary work. It would then have no guaranty whatever that its plans were sound and free from defects until guns had been made in accordance with them and tested. It would be in no position to call for bids until this preliminary work had been done. Should it invite plans from outside sources it would still be necessary to first make and test the guns. The only alternative would be to fall back on the plans, the experience and ability of the ordnance officers, and simply take their work out of their hands, or require that they carry it on under another than their legally-constituted head, the Ordnance Bureau. This arrangement can not lead to satisfactory results, and is most unjust to the officers of the Ordnance Department. This Department has during the past few years designed and worked up experimentally field, siege, and seacoast material that is unsurpassed.

The steel field-gun has been thoroughly tested and is not equaled for lightness and power by a similar gun in any European service. The 8-inch built-up steel gun has been subjected to a severe test of over two hundred rounds, and has given ballistic results that surpass the Krupp 8¼-inch gun of a considerably greater length of bore. The great development of cannon powders, gun steel, and gun construction as an engineering art is, to a very large extent, due to the investigations and labors of the Ordnance Department, and to the encouragement and information which it has given to manufacturers. The proposition to supplant the services of this department by a hastily-devised board is injudicious and harsh in the extreme, and in the absence of sufficient reason therefor can not be justified as a measure necessary for the public good.

A further serious objection must be raised to the creation of this board on the ground of economy in the expenditures of the Government. The board practically constitutes a new bureau supplementary to the present Engineer and Ordnance Departments. Although not provided for in the present bill, the certain outcome of this legislation will make it necessary in subsequent years to provide a clerical force and all the paraphernalia of a new bureau in the War Department to enable this board to properly record and systematize the duties and acts which it has to perform. The Engineer and Ordnance Departments are now fully organized to carry out such work, and their files contain the records of all previous work of the kind. The transfer or transcription of these records, with which the new board must become thoroughly acquainted to properly perform its duties, the creation of new clerkships, and the duplication to a considerable extent of similar work which will remain in the bureaus as at present organized, can only result in additional and wasteful expenditures.

With regard to the provision for cast-iron mortars, it is known that those mortars are overstrained every time they are fired. Their endurance, then, becomes a question of how many such overstrains they will stand, and in view of the fact that one mortar might differ materially from another in this respect, it is thought that either two mortars should be tested or one should be tested by at least four hundred rounds. With regard to the provision in this section for 10 and 12 inch steel guns the Ordnance Department has no objection to make.

The amounts appropriated by the bill are as follows:

Section 2—
For protection, etc., of fortifications	$100,000
Sea walls and embankments	117,000
Torpedoes, etc	500,000
		$717,000
Section 3—
Guns, carriages, projectiles, etc	500,000
Testing and experimenting with high explosives	100,000
		600,000
Section 4—
Gun factory	550,000
Gun steel	2,500,000
		3,050,000
Section 5—
Cast-iron steel-hooped mortars		250,000
Section 6—
Expenses of board		5,000
		4,622,000

The amounts of obligation by the Government authorized but not appropriated for are:

Section 6	$6,000,000
Total appropriated and allowed	10,622,000

As no limit is placed to the number of pieces which may be presented for test under section 6, and as all such which may come up to a prescribed standard, and their ammunition, must be paid for, the part of the $6,000,000, allowed under that section which shall be devoted to the procurement of guns and mortars for the service is undefined.

If sections 1 and 6 were thrown out, the remainder would constitute a logical and practical bill, free from uncertain and objectionable features, and closely resembling the bill as it passed the House.

The passage of the bill in the exact form in which it passed the House would afford a speedy and satisfactory solution of the question.

WATERTOWN ARSENAL, July 14, 1881.

To the President of the Board of Heavy Ordnance, New York City:

SIR: I have the honor respectfully to submit for your consideration, together with my reasons therefor, the proposition to recommend as "worthy of actual test" the following-named guns:

First. An 8-inch cast-iron, rifled gun, represented in Figure 1, and cast as described on page 15.

Second. An 8-inch cast-iron, rifled gun, Figure 2, lined with a thin bronze tube.

Third. An 8-inch cast-iron, rifled gun, breech-loading, Figure 3, and further described on page 16.

It will be observed that these guns are all cast-iron guns, depending solely upon this material for their strength, except only the breech-loader, which is reinforced at the breech by a supplementary steel band.

It may be regarded by some of the members of the board an already settled question, as claimed by some, that cast-iron guns require to be strengthened before they can safely be subjected to the strains which they have to withstand as rifled guns, and I shall therefore endeavor to show that this assertion, if true, has never been proved to be true, but on the contrary there are strong reasons for believing that it is entirely without foundation in fact.

The Ordnance Board of 1868, in giving its opinion on this subject, said, "The success of the experiments with the 12-inch cast-iron rifle at Fort Monroe evidently demonstrates that further trials with cast-iron, recommended by the Chief of Ordnance, in his annual report for 1867, should be made."

The board, which met in New York in 1872 to designate what heavy guns should be tested, expressed the opinion that experiments should be continued by the Ordnance Department, "with a view to obtaining such uniformity of pressures as shall render admissible the use of cast-iron in heavy ordnance construction." The board evidently did not regard it at that time as an established fact that cast-iron would not answer for heavy rifled guns, and it must be borne in mind that no experiments have been made bearing on this question since that time. The board was of opinion that, as soon as our powder and projectiles had been so improved as to give uniform results, cast-iron would be available as a material for heavy guns. General Rodman had expressed to a committee of Congress the same opinion, and in 1873 the Chief of Ordnance, General Dyer, in his annual report, recommended, "in the spirit of judicious economy," an appropriation of $75,000 for the manufacture and trial of cast-iron 12-inch rifled guns. He gave in full the reasons for this recommendation, namely, that the improvements made in both projectiles and powder had been such that the former would offer a uniform resistance to the pressure of the powder, which in its turn gave "increased initial velocity with marked diminution of pressure."

As Chief of Ordnance, he must of necessity have known whether the results of experiments had already proved that cast-iron was not strong enough to resist the strains, and on this account would not answer for heavy rifled guns; that he did not know of any such experiments is clear from the fact that he said that "this recommendation is made in the spirit of judicious economy."

We have then the concurrent opinions of the Ordnance Board of 1868, approved by the Chief of Ordnance, the Board on Heavy Ordnance in 1872, General Rodman, and the Chief of Ordnance again in his report of 1873, that the question of the fitness of cast-iron for heavy rifles was not at that time determined, but was an open one, requiring further experiments; and as no tests have been since made it follows that the question is still an open one, not definitely settled, but remaining to be solved by further trials.

I shall now proceed to show that the weight of evidence, from the endurance of cast-iron guns which have been tested, is in favor of this material as a suitable one for rifled guns of at least 8 inches bore, and to bring together a portion of this evidence, that you may impartially weigh it, and judge whether it be sufficient to warrant further trials being made with rifled guns constructed solely of this metal.

But what are the enormous strains that heavy rifled guns have to resist? When rifled guns of large caliber first began to be used, the quick powder and imperfect projectiles at that time used developed such enormous strains that it came to be generally believed that rifled guns were necessarily subjected to far greater strains than smooth-bore guns of the same size, and this opinion continued to obtain for many years thereafter. Even within a few years back, when the 10-inch converted gun blew out a large portion of the lining tube, tearing off with it the muzzle of the gun, it was accounted for by some by what was called the drag of the projectile passing through the bore. This opinion has, of course, ceased to be entertained.

Professor Bartlett and others have investigated thoroughly the strains brought on rifled guns, and it is now a well-established fact that these strains are only slightly greater than those borne by the smooth-bore gun. The 8-inch rifle projectile leaves the bore with only 48 feet less velocity, as calculated by Bartlett's formula, than would be communicated to the same projectile if it had no rotary motion. Powder and projectiles have been so improved that the action of each is as regular and uniform in the rifled gun as in the smooth-bore; and, as remarked by Professsor Bartlett, the failure of rifled guns must be sought in some other cause than the superaddition of the pulling and twisting strains to that which acts to split the piece; and so far as the principles of rifling are concerned, these guns may be made as safe as the common smooth-bores. The report of the Chief of Ordnance, 1878, page 425, gives the pressures on the bore obtained in the trials of three 8-inch converted guns, the endurance of which is regarded as so highly satisfactory that the Chief of Ordnance, speaking of it, says, "Our success has been so consistent, so thorough, so complete, that we consider it an admirable system of gun construction." One gun endured a mean recorded strain of 26,462 pounds per square inch, from 710 rounds; another stood the same strain from 776 rounds; and a third was subjected to a mean recorded pressure of 27,189 pounds per square inch, from 590 rounds.

The gun first mentioned was not required to bear a single strain as great as 29,000 pounds per square inch; the next endured three strains greater than 40,000 pounds, the greatest being 43,000 pounds, fifteen of 35,000 pounds or more, and three hundred and twenty-two of 30,000 pounds or more. The other, fired only five hundred and ninety times, bore strains of 30,000 pounds or more, fifty-six times; 35,000 pounds or more, thirty-four times; 40,000 or more, nine times; 50,000 pounds or more, four times; and one strain of 56,000 pounds per square inch. The length of the cartridge was 22 inches, and the area of the bore in rear of the projectile 595 square inches, making the aggregate strain endured by this last gun 16,177,455 pounds, repeated five hundred and ninety times.

Will an 8-inch rifled gun, made of cast-iron, endure these strains this number of times?

This question is best answered by showing what cast iron guns of this size have done. Only two cast-iron 8-inch rifled guns have been tested by firing with expanding projectiles. The record of the first I have been able to obtain only this far, that it was fired at Fort Monroe in 1864; it burst at the one thousand and forty-seventh fire, and of the last eighty rounds the pressures were as follows:

1 round, the pressure was less than 20,000 pounds per square inch.
5 rounds, the pressures were less than 27,000 pounds per square inch.
52 rounds, the pressures were 30,000 pounds or more per square inch.
32 rounds, the pressures were 40,000 pounds or more per square inch.
23 rounds, the pressures were 50,000 pounds or more per square inch.
13 rounds, the pressures were 70,000 pounds or more per square inch.
5 rounds, the pressures were 90,000 pounds or more per square inch.
1 round, the pressure was 150,000 pounds per square inch.

The other gun was fired in 1866 eight hundred and forty-five rounds, sustaining the following pressures:

28 rounds, the pressures were less than 20,000 pounds per square inch.
59 rounds, the pressures were less than 7,000 pounds per square inch.
766 rounds, the pressures were 30,000 pounds or more per square inch.
449 rounds, the pressures were 40,000 pounds or more per square inch.
222 rounds, the pressures were 50,000 pounds or more per square inch.
111 rounds, the pressures were 70,000 pounds or more per square inch.
13 rounds, the pressures were 125,000 pounds or more per square inch.
12 rounds, the pressures were 150,000 pounds or more per square inch.

This gun has since been fired nineteen times, making in all eight hundred and sixty-four rounds, and is still sound.

The charge of powder was in most cases 15 pounds, occupying 12 inches of the bore, or an area of 300 square inches.

Here we have two cast-iron guns which have been fired a greater number of times and with greater strains per square inch of the bore pressed than either of the converted guns.

What the equivalent of a pressure of 150,000 pounds per square inch may be in terms of pressures of 27,000 pounds no one will pretend to be able to say. The only experiments which have been made on this subject show that a slight reduction in the strain adds very greatly to the number of times that it may be repeated. Thus a specimen of cast-iron subjected to a strain of 30,000 pounds per square inch endured this strain one hundred and twenty-five times, and its duplicate endured a strain of 27,000 pounds two hundred and fifty times. From this it would be fair to infer that twelve strains of 150,000 pounds per square inch would be equivalent to many hundreds of only 27,000 pounds.

Although these two are the only rifled cast-iron guns which have been tested by firing expanding projectiles, several smooth-bore guns of the same exterior size have been fired from time to time, and a consideration of their endurance will be instructive, and can hardly fail to give us a greater respect for cast-iron as a material to be used in the construction of heavy ordnance.

The first to which I shall invite your attention is 10-inch gun No. 2, W. P. F., 1846, a chambered gun of imperfect model. It was fired—100 rounds, with 18 pounds of powder, and 1 solid shot.

1 round, with 18 pounds of powder, and 2 solid shot.
1 round, with 18 pounds of powder, and 3 solid shot.
1 round, with 18 pounds of powder, and 4 solid shot.
1 round, with 18 pounds of powder, and 5 solid shot.
1 round, with 18 pounds of powder, and 6 solid shot.
1 round, with 18 pounds of powder, and 7 solid shot.
1 round, with 18 pounds of powder, and 8 solid shot.
1 round, with 18 pounds of powder, and 9 solid shot.
1 round, with 36 pounds of powder, and 9 solid shot.

It must be remembered that this powder was what is known as mortar-powder, and gave a strain with a single shot of over 70,000 pounds per square inch. What the strains were with the other charges can only be conjectured, but it is perfectly clear that they must have been very much more violent than any that modern rifled guns are ever made to bear; and that this gun should have endured the last charge of 36 pounds of quick powder and 1,130 pounds of shot without bursting, after having previously endured a number of enormous strains, shows that this cast-iron gun at least was not deficient in strength.

The next which I shall bring to your notice are 10-inch Rodman guns, Nos. 362 and 363, F. P. F., one cast solid and the other hollow. These guns I fired in 1858 2,450 times each. They were afterwards fired by Captain Dyer, at Fort Monroe 1,632 rounds more, making in all 4,082 times each, besides the proof-rounds, with the following charges:

2,396 rounds, with 14 pounds of mortar-powder, 1 shot and sabot.
12 rounds, with 15 pounds of mortar-powder, 1 shot and sabot.
14 rounds, with 16 pounds of mortar-powder, 1 shot and sabot.
15 rounds, with 17 pounds of mortar-powder, 1 shot and sabot.
1,645 rounds, with 18 pounds of mortar-powder, 1 shot and sabot.
1 round, with 20 pounds of mortar-powder and wad.
1 round, with 24 pounds of mortar-powder, 1 shell, sabot, and wad.

The guns are still unbroken. The pressures with 18 pounds of powder, when the guns were new, were 71,950 pounds per square inch, and at the close of the firing 39,793 pounds per square inch.

If we multiply the area of the bore in the rear of the shot by the maximum strain per square inch, we find that these two guns for 1,600 rounds resisted a greater aggregate of strains each round than any of the converted guns, and in several instances nearly twice as much.

Here, then, we have two more cast-iron guns which have shown themselves not only capable of enduring greater strains than the converted guns are subject to, but also of resisting the molecular disturbance caused by firing 4,082 rounds.

The next 10-inch gun which was fired repeatedly with high charges was No. 1442, S. B. F., 1863. It was fired—

1,000 rounds with 15 pounds cannon powder and 1 solid shot or shell.*
100 rounds with 20 pounds cannon powder and solid shot.
100 rounds with 25 pounds cannon powder and solid shot.
100 rounds with 30 pounds cannon powder and solid shot.
100 rounds with 30 pounds quick powder and solid shot.

The pressures were with 25 pounds of cannon powder 39,225 pounds per square inch.

The pressures were with 30 pounds of cannon powder 54,000 pounds per square inch.

The pressures were with 30 pounds of quick powder 64,900 pounds per square inch.

The last 10-inch gun which was tested is No. 542, S. McM. & Co. This gun was supposed to be defective from having too great an initial strain in cooling. It was fired—

18 rounds, with 18 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
17 rounds, with 20 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
2 rounds, with 22 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
456 rounds, with 25 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
125 rounds, with 26 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
4 rounds, with 27 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
1 round, with 28 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
8 rounds, with 30 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
11 rounds, with 32 pounds powder and shot of 127 pounds.
3 rounds, with 35 pounds Oriental powder No. 5 and shot of 127 pounds.

645 total.

* One-fifth were solid shot, the rest shells.

The pressures were as follows:
18 rounds, 20,000 to 30,000 pounds per square inch.
17 rounds, 22,000 to 60,000 pounds per square inch.
2 rounds, 23,000 to 26,000 pounds per square inch.
456 rounds, 22,000 to 65,000 pounds per square inch.
125 rounds, 21,000 to 72,000 pounds per square inch.
4 rounds, 33,000 to 51,000 pounds per square inch.
1 round, 54,000 pounds per square inch.
8 rounds, 26,000 to 100,000 pounds per square inch.
11 rounds, 19,000 to 58,000 pounds per square inch.
3 rounds, 10,000 to 18,000 pounds per square inch.

In estimating the work done by the gun at each discharge, it has been assumed that the part of the bore subjected to the maximum strain is that in rear of the shot at the moment of discharge, but the experiments of Noble and Abel show that with pebble powder the shot has moved about 6 inches from its seat at the time the strain has reached its maximum. No experiments have been made in this country, that I am aware of, to determine this point for our powders. In the smaller grained powders with which the guns just considered were fired, the shot, though lighter, did not probably move as far as in the converted guns, and on this account the amount of work done would have to be corrected somewhat, but to what extent we have not the necessary information to determine.

These experiments show what are the capabilities of cast-iron as a material for guns—what it has done and what it can be made to do. With such facts before the mind, it seems strange that any one can be found who doubts the reliability of cast-iron for rifled guns of at least 8 inches bore. It was the careful study of this demonstration of the ability of cast-iron to resist enormous strains often repeated (results not generally known by officers), and an intelligent appreciation of their bearing and weight that led General Rodman to express the opinion "that after we shall have procured a projectile that is as certain in its operation in the rifled gun as the round shot is in the smooth-bore, we can, by firing to extremity one or two 12-inch rifles, fix a limit within which the gun may be considered as absolutely safe." I for one am of the opinion that the conclusion is abundantly warranted by the facts.

But we, at this present time, are not required to decide the question of the fitness of cast-iron for rifled guns solely on the evidence which has been just adduced. Within the last year or two other experiments have been made having an intimate bearing on this subject, throwing much light on it and rendering it far easier of a definite solution. To these I shall now briefly allude.

In 1878 I induced the board for testing iron, steel, and other metals to grant me an appropriation of $1,000 to make experiments on the resistance to internal strains of thick cast-iron cylinders, some of which were to be lined with wrought-iron or bronze tubes. These experiments were not completed until September last, and proved conclusively that the cylinder was weaker in proportion as it was cut away to make room for the lining tube.

Cast-iron cylinders 11 inches in diameter and 22 inches long were bored out to a diameter of 3.3 inches, filled with beeswax to a depth of 10 inches, and a pressure applied to a closely fitting piston until the cylinder was burst. Similar cylinders were bored out to receive a lining of wrought-iron formed of the same metal and in the same manner as the wrought-iron tubes used in the conversion of 10-inch guns, the interior diameter of the lining being the same as the first-mentioned cylinders. The circumstances of the trials were the same as nearly as possible in both cases, and the strength of the cast-iron cylinders was found to be about 18 per cent. greater than those lined with wrought-iron. Experiments were also made to test the effect of continuing the bore through the breech and afterwards closing it with a screw-plug. These last cylinders were found to have about 5 per cent. less strength than that with a solid breech.

These experiments show that since a new and better gun can be made for a less sum than that paid for the conversion of the old gun, it was an error to convert any of the latter; but such conversion having been determined upon, it was an error to enlarge the bore at all with the view to increasing the thickness of the wrought-iron lining; and it further diminished the strength to continue the bore through the breech in order to insert the lining from the rear. It was also an error to make the tube in two parts, thereby still further decreasing its traverse resistance.

General Rodman has proved beyond a doubt that the sudden strain exerted by inflamed gunpowder does not partake of the nature of a blow, but is a pressure quickly applied and as quickly relieved; it differs from the pressure exerted by the testing machine only in the rate of application and release of the strain. The effect of this rapid application has been carefully considered by both Mallet and Rodman, and the conclusion reached is, "that the excessive strain upon the gun above that due to statical pressure, caused by the most rapid rate of application or development of that pressure, is a very small percentage of the total strain." General Rodman based his whole system of gun construction upon the results obtained by the testing machine, and, so far as I am aware, the correctness of his conclusions has never been questioned. So too, Colonel (now General) Rosset, of the Italian army, has based his present system of guns, in which the combination of wrought and cast iron has been rejected, on the results obtained by the testing machine.

It has been urged with great confidence by some that the results obtained by these experiments are in direct conflict with certain gunpowder tests made by Sir Joseph Whitworth, which are regarded as conclusive in proving that cast-iron guns are not as strong as similar guns lined with wrought-iron tubes.

The account of these experiments as given by Sir Joseph himself shows that they were undertaken to prove the superiority of his compressed steel over wrought-iron, cast-iron lined with wrought-iron, and in fact all other materials for guns. He took a cylinder made of cast-iron "which I (he) knew to be of good quality," 26 inches long, 7.83 inches in diameter, and a bore of 2.56 inches. The ends were closed with steel plungers, after having introduced 3 ounces of powder, and secured by steel caps screwed on. The cylinder burst into twenty pieces. He adds: "I have also had a cylinder made of cast-iron, with a coiled wrought-iron tube inside to represent the proportions adopted in the conversion of old 8-inch smooth-bore guns into rifled 64-pounders. The inner diameter or bore was 2.56 inches; the thickness of the wrought-iron tube, 0.690 inch; and the outside diameter, 7.83 inches. The area of cast-iron was not sufficient to support the end strain, and the caps were held together by additional screws fitted into an external casing. Four charges were fired, the weight of powder being 5, 6, 8, and 10 ounces respectively. The enlargement of the cylinder after the discharge of 8 ounces was 0.0317 inches on the inside, and 0.0017 inches on the outside. The fourth discharge of only 10 ounces broke the cylinder into fragments, namely, of cast-iron one hundred and seventy-four and of wrought-iron seven pieces."

It is to be borne in mind that these experiments were not made for the purpose of comparing cast-iron guns with similar ones lined with wrought-iron; the cast-iron in the two cases was not identical; it was not gun-iron, and therefore the comparative strength of the two cylinders proves nothing as to the strength of guns lined and not lined with wrought-iron. That the iron was not gun-iron is evident from several considerations. In the first place it is not spoken of as anything more than "good iron." How good it was, what was its tensile strength, its density, elasticity, or extensibility, is not stated, and was not probably known. An iron which will stand 12,000 pounds per square inch is in England considered a good iron, but we do not think of making guns of such metal; for this purpose only the best cold-blast charcoal iron, melted in an air furnace, and having a tensile strength of 30,000 pounds per square inch as the minimum, with a good extensibility and elasticity, is ever thought of as a proper gun-iron.

The very fact that 3 ounces of powder burst a cylinder of 2.56 inches bore and 2.5 inches thickness shows conclusively that the iron was not gun-iron, and the additional fact that 10 ounces of powder burst a similar cylinder 1.945 inches thick, with a wrought-iron lining 0.69-inch thick, into one hundred and seventy-four fragments is incontestable proof that this was not such an iron as guns are made of.

It is further to be observed that the two cylinders were not tested under the same circumstances. The lined cylinder was entirely relieved from all longitudinal strains, for "the caps were held together by additional screws fitted into an external casing." That this arrangement enabled the lined cylinder to offer greater resistance there can be no doubt, but to what extent it is difficult to estimate.

That any logical conclusions conflicting with the results obtained from my experiments on cylinders can be drawn from Sir Joseph's powder tests, just described, is so evidently impossible that further remark is unnecessary.

If, however, in place of my deductions, based on these trials, you should prefer to have the results of direct experiments, I am glad to be able to lay such results before you, for I have recently had the satisfaction of witnessing some carefully conducted experiments made by Capt. John G. Butler, Ordnance Department, wherein he proposed to repeat Whitworth's powder test of iron cylinders, using our gun-iron of known good quality. Two cylinders were cast from the same ladleful of metal, turned to the same exterior dimensions, and bored out the same as Whitworth's, and one of them lined with a wrought-iron tube of the best quality. These were fired with 3, 4, 6, 8, and 10 ounces of powder taken from the same barrel. After resisting the 8-ounce charge, the simple cast-iron cylinder showed no increase in the exterior diameter; the lined one was enlarged 0.008 inch. The bore of the former had enlarged 0.015 inch, the latter 0.052 inch; and it is plain that the lined cylinder was nearer the point of rupture than the other. The charges of 10 ounces, which increased the strain more than 25 per cent., ruptured both cylinders, the cast-iron of each breaking into twenty-six pieces, and the tube into seven pieces additional.

This powder test, then, confirms the results of the experiments made with the testing-machine, and extinguishes forever the unsupported claim of the superior strength of the lined cylinder.

I have still one more fact which I wish to lay before you before closing my argument in favor of the superior strength of cast-iron guns over those lined with wrought-iron tubes. It is the result of an experiment made with gunpowder, and it seems to me to be conclusive on this subject.

Finding that there was no prospect of the Ordnance Department authorizing any experiments to show whether gunpowder would confirm or disprove the verdict of the testing-machine in regard to the strength of cast-iron guns, and regarding the question as one of great importance to the country, I proceeded to procure on my own account two cast-iron guns representing accurately in exterior model the 10-inch Rodman guns to a scale of four-tenths the full size, and to line one of them with a coiled wrought-iron tube made in the same way and of the same metal as the tubes used in the conversion of guns; the other was of simple cast-iron. The guns were cast solid from the same ladleful of metal, and were finished without trunnions, and of the same size in every particular as nearly as possible. The model selected was that of the converted 8-inch rifle. The maximum diameter was 12.8 inches, and that of the bore 3.2 inches. The weights were 955 and 931½ pounds, respectively. The guns were fired under the same circumstances, with charges of 2.5 pounds of powder, and first with a shot weighing 22 pounds, second with one of 30½ pounds, and afterwards with two shot of the last-named weight. The cast-iron gun proved superior to the lined gun in about the same proportion as had been found by the experiments with statical pressures, and we have the verdict of superior strength of the cast-iron gun over that of cast-iron lined with a wrought-iron tube, pronounced in the first place by the testing-machine, now confirmed by actual trial with gunpowder in a gun of 3.2-inch bore. I have only briefly referred to these trials for the reason that my reports of September 11, 1880, and June 25, 1881, to the Chief of Ordnance will doubtless be laid before you under the direction to "furnish the board with all the information on the subject in his possession."

I am of the opinion that it is not advisable to convert the 10-inch smooth-bore guns into rifles. The object of the trials which I here propose is to show that it will be far more economical to make new guns, which shall be in every respect superior to the converted guns, and can be produced at the same or less cost. I propose to make an 8-inch rifle longer and heavier than the converted gun, to cast it breech uppermost, the hollow core passing through the breech, with the view of avoiding the initial strains that are known to exist in guns cast with a solid breech; to fire it to extremity with a proper powder, to be determined by trial, which shall give an initial velocity of 1,290 feet or more, or continue the firing until its superiority shall be conclusively established.

It is well known that cast-iron guns begin to break from the interior, cracks form and the gases entering therein act on a larger area, and finally burst the gun. The extent to which this shortens the life of the gun is not known, and it is proposed to determine it by the gun No. 2, which has a thin tube of bronze lining the bore; the tube may be turned and grooved on its exterior and then inserted in the bore, or the cheaper plan of lining only the chamber may be used.

It is proposed to fire this gun under exactly the same circumstances, with the same charges, etc., as the first, and thus determine the question whether the increased cost is compensated by the greater endurance of the gun.

The Heavy Ordnance Board of 1872 recommended that a breech-loading gun, with the slotted-screw breech similar to that used by the French, Swedes, and Italians, should be tested. No such trial has ever yet been made by the Ordnance Department, and the success which has attended this plan in other countries and our own Navy, its greater simplicity and less cost, compared with the plan adopted, render it highly desirable that a fair trial of its merits should be made.

No. 3 represents such a gun. It will be cast breech uppermost, cooled from the interior, and have a thin band of steel around the breech.

The guns here proposed have received the approval of one of the great gun-founders of the country, who has adopted the first and second, the latter without the supplementary steel band, and recommends them as good models for cast-iron guns.

The vast extent of our seacoast which calls for protection is so great as to require large rifled guns by the thousand; and the question of what material they shall be constructed becomes one of the greatest importance. We have cast-iron of the best quality, and we understand the manner of treating it in order to make uniformly superior guns of the largest caliber. If these guns will answer as well as those of more expensive construction, it is highly important that we should know it at once. If they shall prove to be superior to those which we are now making, as I believe they will do, and as I think the facts which I have here adduced will warrant us in believing, we can not have the proof of it too soon.

General Rodman proposed to improve the quality of our cast-iron guns by improving the metal of which they are made, and the best mode of doing this he carefully elaborated; but the present adopted plan of increasing the efficiency of our heavy ordnance discards this plan, and in its place adopts a certain combination of wrought and cast iron, thereby adding greatly to the cost of production, and, according to the results of the experiments just mentioned, diminishing in a marked degree the strength and endurance of the gun. Whether it be advisable to continue the fabrication of large guns on this latter plan without first comparing their endurance with that of cast-iron guns pure and simple, as herein proposed, is a question left to you to decide, with the aid of all the light that can be thrown upon it by the latest experiments, supplemented by such as you may deem it wise to make.

T. T. S. LAIDLEY, Colonel of Ordnance.

Now, sir, I appeal to the Senator from Connecticut, who I know is earnest in wanting this work to go on, that after two or three years' patient and earnest consideration of this question by the committees as to the proper course to pursue, and after having finally reached a conclusion that we believe makes it possible not only for the Government to begin the construction of these guns, but where, also, the door for the first time in twenty-five years is thrown open to the private manufacturers—I appeal to the Senator not to obstruct this legislation, not to destroy it, by pressing an amendment which can have but that one effect.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am a good deal surprised by the remarks of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. The bill as it stands now does not profess to take away the powers of any one of the departments of the Army, nor in my judgment does it really do so. I should be glad to have the honor of the Senator's attention, because I am talking to him directly. I should like to know the paragraph of this bill which changes existing law—a thing that would be out of order anyhow if put in the bill. I do not know how the bill does change existing law. The appointment of boards advisory and supervisory is a common custom both in the Army and in the Navy. I am glad in many respects to see the scheme started of having one, even a permanent advisory board in the Ordnance Department, a board to which all inventors and schemers, if you will, may come with their devices, some good, some bad, some wise, and some foolish, where all may come with their ideas and submit them. I am glad, too, that this board are to have this money to expend, so that where they have a thing submitted to them they may try it, and if it be a good thing they can recommend it to the Secretary of War for further expenditure, and he can recommend to Congress the particular improvement, whatever it may be. But whenever they adopt an improvement or whenever they advise the construction of a gun and the expenditure of money, then that goes on under the ordinary statutes, even with the bill as it is drawn up. The bill says the money—

Shall be expended under the direct supervision of a board to consist of the commanding general of the Army, an officer of engineers, two officers of ordnance, and an officer of artillery, to be selected by the Secretary of War, to be called and known as the board of ordnance and fortification.

Now, how is the money expended? Ordinarily in most of these matters they ask for bids from private citizens, and contracts are made as a result. Is it to be supposed that this board of five officers is to appear in a contract as the contracting party, that they are to sign all the contracts requiring ordnance for the Army? Not at all. Section 1164 of the Revised Statutes directs that. The Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers signs the contract, and the money will be expended in the ordinary way upon the proper certificates, vouchers, etc.

The amendment I have offered is simply, from excess perhaps of caution, to provide that nothing should be taken from the engineers or artillery officers in their ordinary duties by this statute; nor do I think it very essential that my amendment should be adopted, because I do not think it is done anyhow. This board has no powers that the Secretary of War could not put on a board at any time.

A word now with regard to the reflections of the Senator from Maryland on the ordnance officers. His censure, Mr. President, is undeserved. So far as the presence of the officers is concerned about the corridors and galleries of the Senate, I say very frankly that as to the whole discussion upon the Army bill and upon this bill I have requested the attendance of an officer about this building to whom I might refer in a minute some technical question that might arise, for the benefit of the Senate as well as for my own information.

I do not know that these young men have been here (sometimes one, sometimes two) on a single occasion except at my own personal request, either by my telling them or telephoning to them that the bill was up and that I wished them to come up to the Capitol, because questions might arise about caliber or cost or material or a hundred things bearing upon the subject that I might wish to be informed about.

Mr. GORMAN. With that statement of the Senator, and of course I must accept it, the officers have a right to be exonerated. May I ask the Senator whether he requested Captain Smith or any other ordnance officer to be here to circulate, without signature, the statement of which I hold a copy in my hand?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know what the statement is to which the Senator from Maryland refers, but the captain at my request and in my room made a memorandum of points that he had orally made to me, and I asked him questions about various provisions of the bill, which he answered with such rapidity and lucidity that I said to him, "You must write those down; I can not remember them; they are points that are valuable." He gave me afterward a type-written statement, which I have here, in which I see nothing disrespectful whatever. One page of it I quoted nearly literally in my remarks of yesterday, and there are other remarks here in the form of comments on the appropriations made by the bill and stating that if section so-and-so were thrown out so-and-so would result, and defending the provisions of section 1 as related to the proposed board of ordnance and fortifications and all that. Now, whether this is or is not the one that he has printed I do not know. He told me this morning he had given a paper to, I think, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I do not know whether he included the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] or not, but he named one or two other Senators to whom he had given the paper. I told him to give one to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who is a member of the Military Committee. There is no mystery about this, Mr. President, nor is there any intentional disrespect in any part of it; none whatever. I take the responsibility of the whole transaction, unless in the entirely improbable case (I venture to say that can not be so) that in printing the statement which he showed to me he added something improper; and that can not be. In this that I have here there is nothing whatever out of the way.

Mr. GORMAN. When the fact is that these officers in the different branches of the public service had the opportunity and were requested to make every suggestion that it was possible for them to make with regard to this matter to the Committee on Appropriations when the committee took this matter up, and when the legislation was pending between these two Houses—when, I say, these officers had the opportunity to make every suggestion that they desired to make, when they knew that the general commanding the Army had agreed that the provisions of this bill were the best that it was possible to make in the interest of the Government, I ask the Senator whether he thinks it is right that afterward a subordinate officer of the Army should come here and circulate, partially, an argument against the very bill that he knew had been so considered, and when the only effect of his argument would be to place all the money that was appropriated in the hands of his bureau, and to exclude the possibility of private enterprise competing with them. Is it not an outrage?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator puts a construction on this matter which it does not admit of at all, if that statement be the one I have here, written with a type-writer. I am very glad to have the statement in the RECORD, because it will itself be a sufficient answer to the Senator's criticism. If the same as mine, it was written at my personal request, and given to Senators at my personal request, as criticism upon the whole of the pending bill. I take the entire responsibility on my shoulders.

Mr. BECK. In view of what has happened I give notice that at the proper time I shall move to make the number of ordnance officers of this board not two, but one, and let it stand as the committee brought it in. There is some object why two ordnance officers want to get so many things into the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I made that motion myself.

Mr. BECK. I know the Senator did.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can tell the Senator what the object is. There is no mystery in it. I wish the Senator were not so quick to see mystery in things.

Mr. BECK. I am a member of the committee, and I do not think that private papers should be handed to some members that Senators generally can not see.

Mr. HAWLEY. Captain Smith had no charge of the general distribution of these papers. The persons to whom he gave the papers were persons whose names I suggested. Now, as to the point of having two ordnance officers on the board, that is not a suggestion of my own, but of the commanding general of the Army. Originally one ordnance officer, one artillery officer, one engineer officer, and the commanding general of the Army were to compose the board and consider the whole business of ordnance and supplies.

It is evident that the ordnance officer would be the working member of the board, and it is evident that occasions would arise when the engineer and artillery officers would overrule the ordnance officer, who is really practically, as well as presumptively, entitled to more consideration than the others because ordnance is his life-profession. General Schofield said to me that there should be two ordnance officers instead of one, and then an artillery and an engineer officer. He supposed that they would agree almost always, but it was quite possible that some time they might not agree, and he preferred that the ordnance officer might not be overruled. So it was arranged that in case of a tie the commanding general of the Army could decide. He thought the work would be better done in every way by that arrangement, and that is the reason I moved that amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. Early in the session there was a bill introduced into the House of Representatives providing for a contract with the South Boston Iron Works for cast-iron mortars and guns. I received and I suppose every member of Congress received a printed brief, made up by a prominent attorney of this city, in favor of that bill, undertaking to show Senators and Representatives why they should make a contract with this private company for the purpose of furnishing these guns to the Government. Now, we have severe criticisms upon an officer of the Ordnance Corps because, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, he has made a statement which he has submitted and presented to certain Senators.

Mr. BECK. What I complain of is that they did not distribute them. If an officer of the Army gives information to the Senate of the United States the Senate has a right to have it as a Senate, and each member has a right to it.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not understand so. I think any Senator of this body has a right to go and see any officer of the Army, whether of the Engineer Corps or the Ordnance Corps or any other, and get any information he desires on any subject of legislation.

Mr. BECK. Nobody denies that.

Mr. DOLPH. I will get to the proposition in a moment if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. BECK. What I deny is that any officer of the Army has a right to come here and distribute for the use of a few Senators or Members of Congress any communication that he intends to affect a matter before the Senate or House of Representatives.

Mr. DOLPH. I assert that any officer of the Army, having naturally an interest in any question before Congress, or any officer of the Navy similarly placed, has a right to see any Member of Congress or Senator and furnish him in writing or in print a statement as to the effect of the measure, or a statement concerning his views, if he does it at his own expense, and I say he is not insubordinate in doing so.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make an explanation before we go any further. I have seen an officer of the Ordnance Corps within the last three minutes, since this matter has been up, and he has explained to me that this paper is official, and that the Secretary of War to-day sent it officially to the committees of both Houses.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I rose to say when I sought the floor at the moment the Senator from Connecticut was recognized.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator say that it was sent?

Mr. HAWLEY. It has been sent officially by the Secretary of War. The Senator from Iowa can explain about it.

Mr. ALLISON. As chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I received to-day——

Mr. BECK. How long ago was this received?

Mr. ALLISON. I should say three hours ago I received, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing a communication from the acting Chief of Ordnance, and calling my attention to it. I called the attention of the Senator from Kansas to it and he said he had himself received a copy of it. Supposing this debate would slide along in a pleasant, agreeable way, I did not have it presented and read to the Senate. As it has been mentioned, however, I will now have the Acting Secretary's letter read at the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, August 31, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of your committee, a letter of this date from the acting Chief of Ordnance, with comments on the fortification bill now pending in the Senate.

Very respectfully,

R. MACFEELY,
Acting Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., August 31, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith some comments on the fortifications bill now pending in the Senate, and request that, with your approval, the same may be sent to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

As the provisions of this bill, so far as they relate to the duties of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, are in direct conflict with those of section 1164, Revised Statutes, prescribing the duties of the Chief of Ordnance—a statute that has been in force for seventy-three years—I deem it important that the attention of the Senate should be specially called to this matter, and to the comments herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. L. SMITH,
Captain Ordnance Department, United States Army,
Acting Chief of Ordnance.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. GORMAN. I will ask if that is the entire communication?

Mr. ALLISON. That incloses the comments. I did not have those read, because I understood they were the subject of debate.

Mr. GORMAN. I have presented a copy to the Senate, and I wanted to know if this letter included that.

Mr. DOLPH. I think some Senators are entirely too sensitive about the part taken by the officers of the Ordnance Corps in regard to this question of fortifications. It is true that the jurisdiction of this bill is with the Committee on Appropriations; but I suppose they have to get their information in regard to it like other members of the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator permit me to ask the Senator from Iowa another question—whether the "comments" included in this official communication were signed, or is this the only communication that is signed? The copy I have is without signature.

Mr. ALLISON. This paper is without signature. It is headed, "Comments on the act 'making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. HALE. It is precisely the same paper that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] sent to the desk and had printed.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand that these "comments" printed and in circulation in the Senate Chamber this morning are the product of Captain Smith, now acting Chief of Ordnance?

Mr. ALLISON. He so states, as I understand, in his letter to the Secretary of War. I find that this document is marked with the words and figures "War Department, 4,080 A: 1888"—the words "War Department" and the figures "1888" being in black ink, while the "4,080 A:" are in red ink.

Mr. HAWLEY. A single suggestion more. The Senator from Maryland referred to the ordnance officers as desiring to keep the entire expenditure for these constructions and so forth in their own hands. This very paper that has been submitted contains this clause:

With regard to the provision in this section for 10 and 12 inch steel guns the Ordnance Department have no objection to make.

That is the provision inviting bids for manufacture according to the specimen gun, and involving several million dollars of expenditure. That is the most important provision regarding the construction of guns, and as to that this paper states that the Ordnance Department has no objection to make.

Mr. DOLPH. I repeat what I said, that there is an oversensitiveness as to what the officers of ordnance think about this question of fortifications. As I have said before, the Appropriations Committee have charge of this bill. The Senate appointed a Committee on Coast Defenses and did me the honor to make me chairman of it. I supposed there was some duty connected with that, and so have felt interested in the subject. The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment to the Army appropriation bill, and that was placed as a Senate amendment to the bill as it came from the House. I suppose every Senator desires sufficient information to vote intelligently on this matter, and whenever a bill is introduced, evidently in the interest of private parties, the South Boston Company or any other, not only are Senators importuned on all occasions as to every scheme, but printed briefs are prepared and sent to every Senator; and it would be a strange thing if an officer of the Ordnance Corps, believing that he could impart some information on the subject, should not be at liberty to submit his views, publicly if you please, or in private by oral or written communications.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me interrupt the Senator a moment to remark that what he has said about private parties is entirely gratuitous. The provision as it came from the House for $500,000 for the purchase of cast-iron mortars was contained in the estimates of the War Department submitted by this very Ordnance Department to the Secretary of War, and by him to the Secretary of the Treasury. The officers did appear before the Committee on Appropriations (I think I may state this without any impropriety) and stated that the expenditure would be made through the medium of the South Boston Iron Works. So far, therefore, as that concern is embraced in the criticism of the Senator from Oregon it is a criticism of the Ordnance Bureau which he is now defending.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator is entirely mistaken in regard to what I said. It was stated yesterday by the Senator from Connecticut, and I think appears in the statements of others also, that in all probability the South Boston Iron Works would have the benefit of most of this bill; that is, in regard to mortars of cast-iron bodies and hoops of steel, and as regards cast-iron mortars; but I did not refer to this provision in my remarks to-day, and my remarks will show that I referred to a provision in another branch of Congress, which provided for a large appropriation for cast-iron guns.

Mr. PLUMB. I understood the Senator to say that the Committee on Appropriations were instrumental in doing something which was going to involve a private speculation and that it had been said that the Committee on Appropriations had not been careful about it. The moment that is attempted to be shown there will be something said that will not be comfortable to some persons.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator means to refer to anything that would be uncomfortable to me, he can say it now.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not mean that at all; I do not refer to the Senator, but to the people who have set in motion this proceeding. That is all. This paper refers not to what took place in another body, but to the present bill, and is a sharp, clear, selfish criticism of it, and I think an impertinent one in some respects, with all due respect to everybody else. I think it decidedly impertinent, but so far as I am concerned I can take those things; but when it comes to members of this body proceeding to castigate somebody because private speculation is involved, or something of that kind, I think they ought to be particular.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator is entirely mistaken with regard to my remarks, as the RECORD to-morrow morning will show.

Mr. PLUMB. I should prefer to know what the RECORD shows to-day about this matter.

Mr. DOLPH. Then what the RECORD shows to-day. The RECORD will show to-morrow, so far as I am concerned, that I did say that when a bill is introduced which is in the interest of a private corporation or party or for something which the Government does not want and the Government officers do not recommend, then every member of Congress is notified on every occasion and a printed argument in favor of the measure is sent to every member of the Senate. That is what I said.

I did not intimate that any provision of this bill was in the interest of any private corporation, but I do think that, as I said yesterday, the proposition to purchase cast-iron mortars and hooped mortars is all wrong, and that the moneys ought not to be appropriated.

In regard to the provisions of this bill, I am not criticising anybody in connection with them. I am simply asserting that in my judgment an officer of the Ordnance Corps has as good a right to be heard and to give an opinion to the Senate as the attorneys of private parties.

Mr. PLUMB. As to there being any disposition to prevent these people from being heard, not only was there none, but they were sent for. So far as I know, there has never been an investigation in the Committee on Appropriations on this subject without the ordnance officers being sent for; and not only were they listened to with entire respect and questioned about everything bearing on the subject in hand so far as the facts were concerned, but were also invited to present their opinions as to the propositions that were involved.

For my part I do not think much of this printed article that has been referred to. I think the effect of it is heightened by its being sent through the Secretary of War, although it was not only sent through the Secretary of War but it was circulated privately, because the Senator from Iowa handed me a copy which was not sent through the Committee on Appropriations, and evidently was designed for private circulation among the members of the Senate with the view of affecting this bill. It was not necessary to get the Public Printer to set it up and print and distribute copies of it for the purpose of having it known that the Ordnance Bureau was working against this bill. That goes without saying. Consequently the expenditure of the money—fifty or sixty or more dollars—whatever the expense was, although entirely illegal in my judgment and worthy of reprobation, was unnecessary. This paper does not limit itself to a general description of the proposed amendments, but indulges in what I think impertinent criticism of the Senate and of the committee which proposed the measure; and I do not think it consistent with the relations that exist between the legislative and executive departments of the Government.

I do not care to say anything further about it; but going back to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], I want to say that, with all due respect to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], it has been my idea all the while that the Ordnance Bureau and the Engineer Bureau and the Artillery Bureau or branches of the service should, under the direction of this board, expend the money to be expended within the jurisdiction of these various bureaus. I do not think it would be desirable that they should go outside of these bureaus for the purpose of getting some new force to make this expenditure—a new set of clerks, a new set of Army officers, and so on. Therefore I do not think the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is necessary, and at the same time I am not unwilling that it should be put upon the bill, inasmuch as he seems to wish it to be done.

I say that because in the first place I believe we have a great deal of talent in all these branches of the service. I believe we have very accomplished engineer officers, but I sincerely believe that they are not only not thoroughly competent for all this work, but I believe that Congress will not give it all to them to do, and that those who are interested a great deal more than I am in their representative capacity in what is called coast defense and in provisions for fortifications ought to be very willing and anxious that a board should be created which would have the confidence of Congress, as the present Ordnance Bureau has not, whether wrongfully or otherwise.

Now, to show how frail this Ordnance Bureau is, and to how small things it can descend for the purpose of influencing legislation, let me read this paragraph from this anonymous circular—for that is what it is:

A further serious objection must be raised to the creation of this board on the ground of economy in the expenditures of the Government.

There is a lecture for you "as is a lecture" on the subject of economy—and from the Ordnance Bureau!

The board practically constitutes a new bureau supplementary to the present Engineer and Ordnance Departments.

Something that they will find entirely apart from the legal effect of the measure. It will not be "supplemental" to anything; it will be superior to everything, or else it will not be what it is intended to be.

Although not provided for in the present bill—

Of course from the incompetency of Congress—

the certain outcome of this legislation will make it necessary in subsequent years to provide a clerical force and all the paraphernalia of a new bureau in the War Department to enable this board to properly record and systematize the duties and acts which it has to perform. The Engineer and Ordnance Departments are now fully organized to carry out such work—and their files contain the records of all previous work of the kind. The transfer or transcription of these records, with which the new board must become thoroughly acquainted to properly perform its duties, the creation of new clerkships, and the duplication to a considerable extent of similar work which will remain in the bureaus as at present organized, can only result in additional and wasteful expenditures.

Disinterested testimony, of course!—

Another Daniel come to judgment! We are actually being lectured on account of our extravagance by these very bureaus of the Government that have been hounding us for years because we did not give them money enough to indulge in extravagance of the most extraordinary kind. I object to being lectured in that way.

I should not have called attention to it if it had not been called up otherwise. I have proceeded in all these matters with the utmost good-will toward the individuals composing that bureau, and with the belief that it was not only wise but a part of the purpose of this bill that they should carry out those things which properly pertain to their duties, as a result of the duties which are to be performed by the board that is created. That is all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I received one of these circulars, which is headed—

Comments on the act "making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armanent thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes."

I read it over, not carefully, rather hastily. It did not seem to me that there was anything in it that indicated any disrespect on the part of the Ordnance Department in getting it up, if it was got up by them. I did not agree, and do not agree, with some of its criticisms, and I passed the paper over to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who has taken a deep interest in this bill, thinking that perhaps it might be worth his while to look at it and see if there was anything in it of importance, while the bill was being discussed by the Senate. In looking at it again I do not see that the Senate or the Committee on Appropriations, whose provisions upon the bill I think in many regards will accomplish good, need be sensitive about it. As the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has said, we get every day from outside parties and from parties in the Departments as well, suggestions and comments upon pending bills, and I did not look upon this as anything more than that. I do not believe that the members of the Ordnance Department intended in this matter to do anything that should be disrespectful to the Senate or to the committee.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether in his long experience in the Senate, when the head of a Department or one of the subordinate officers of this Government has been before the Committee on Appropriations and had ample opportunity to discuss a measure, he has ever known before such a criticism upon the action of a committee, after they had reported a bill, as in this case?

Mr. HALE. Well, yes, I have known instances where I have had the management of bills myself, where the conclusion arrived at by the committee finally in reporting the bill was not in accord with the desires of the Department, where the Department has sent up objections and criticisms on the course pursued, and I have not felt that there was anything disrespectful in their doing that. I would not agree with their criticisms and would not perhaps modify the bill, but until the bill passed I take it that they may send in suggestions.

Mr. PLUMB. I will ask the Senator from Maine whether he ever before heard of one of the Departments complaining of the extravagance of Congress in enacting legislation?

Mr. HALE. I agree entirely with the Senator from Kansas in that regard. Congress is never able to keep up with the claims, requirements, and demands of the Departments; no matter how much money we appropriate, we are always behind what they want us to expend. I do not suppose the Ordnance Department is any more economical than the others.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say as to the part I took in the matter, that I read over the article referred to by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. I looked over my desk and over the desks around me here and I doubt whether a single copy of that paper has reached this side of the Chamber.

Mr. PLATT. I have not had any, on the opposite side.

Mr. BECK. I do not think any copy reached here, except that handed to the Senator from Maryland by the Senator from Maine. If there is one here I have not seen it. These men have had an opportunity of being heard before the Committee on Appropriations, and then they send an anonymous communication here—for that is what it is; it is not signed by anybody. To be sure it comes also through the War Department now, though that fact was not known to one of us until the Senator from Iowa mentioned it a moment ago. But that was not a respectable way even for the Acting Secretary of War to treat a committee of this Congress. I do not know any of these ordnance officers, but I agree, after reading that thing and the lecture they saw fit to give us, that the Senator from Kansas did not characterize it too strongly, and I desire now to say that I will, unless I change my mind, when this bill gets into the Senate move to strike out two ordnance officers and let one remain. That gives them all the power that I think they are entitled to, or that this communication shows that they deserve.

Mr. HALE. I am not the advocate or defender of the Ordnance Department. I do not even know the officer who it is said prepared this document.

Mr. BECK. I do not know him; I never saw him.

Mr. HALE. It did not occur to me that there was anything secret about it, and I do not now think there was. I gave the paper very readily to the Senator from Maryland, and he had a perfect right to use it precisely as he has used it. It seems to me that in sending it to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whatever may be said of any other mode, the Ordnance Department did the only thing it could do if it sought to bring to Congress or to the Senate any further views while the measure was pending; that is, to send the communication to the chairman of the committee, or to the Senator in charge of the bill, in order that the suggestions might go for what they were worth.

Mr. ALLISON. This communication, I wish to say, came to me during the morning at my desk here. I called the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the fact, and he said that he had one of those papers. So I allowed the communication to lie on my table—that communication of the Secretary of War. Of course if I had supposed that it was a matter of importance as to the mode of communicating or as to the importance of having these letters read, I should have had them put in the RECORD early in this debate.

Mr. PLUMB. I would like to ask the Senator if he does not think that it is time for minor executive officers to advise Congress when they are asked for their opinion? Do not the Constitution and the laws point out the way in which Congress shall ascertain the opinion of the executive department, and is it not a little bit strange, I will say impertinent, for any executive officer, and especially for officers of minor degree, to be lecturing Congress about extravagance, and complaining about the terms of a bill, especially of a bill as to which they were before consulted?

Mr. ALLISON. In response to the first suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, I will say that I quite agree with him; but it is the custom, grown up in our communication with the Executive Departments, which has existed for a long time. Either the heads of Departments trust the chief clerk to come here or even the head of a bureau sends down. For example, this morning the Paymaster-General sent down the chief clerk of the Pay Department to make an inquiry of me respecting the condition of the Army appropriation bill and urging that something should be done about it. I do not think these young men are very greatly to blame about it. They are enthusiastic in their views and they may not have a proper regard for what should be done as respects the methods of presenting these things. I must say honestly that I did not read the paper which has been referred to; I did not look it over. I was entirely satisfied with the report made by the Committee on Appropriations. I thought we had made a bill that was a fairly good bill, and I supposed the Senate would agree with it.

I know, of course, that every Department of this Government desires to hold all the power and control that it can, and I knew perfectly well that this arrangement for a board would not be agreeable to the Ordnance Bureau. But I had the same understanding respecting it that the Senator from Kansas had, that this board was to be a supervising board, a directing board, and that as their directions were made they would be executed in the various bureaus of the War Department under the supervision of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HAWLEY. And under existing statutes.

Mr. ALLISON. We had no expectation that we were repealing statutes, and therefore I am perfectly willing that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut shall prevail if it is deemed necessary to make it certain that these appropriations shall be expended in detail by these different bureaus. That is all there is of that.

Mr. MORGAN. The act giving power to the Chief of Ordnance, and which, I believe, is the law under which he now proceeds, was enacted in 1815, in February, at a time when we were in a good deal of military trouble and distress, and Congress seemed then to have the idea of conferring upon this officer, the Chief of Ordnance, very broad and arbitrary powers:

> It shall be the duty of the Chief of Ordnance to furnish estimates and, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to make contracts and purchases for procuring the necessary supplies of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the armies of the United States; to direct the inspection and proving of the same, and to direct the construction of all cannon and carriages, ammunition wagons, traveling forges, artificer's wagons, and of every implement and apparatus for ordnance, and the preparation of all kinds of ammunition and ordnance stores constructed or prepared for said service.

I do not suppose an officer of the United States Government in a subordinate character ever had broader powers than these in controlling expenditures; but, after all, the Secretary of War is always supposed to be a civilian, and he is not expected to have any particular military skill, especially in the scientific departments, such as ordnance, and he is under the advice and largely under the influence, not to say the control, of the Chief of Ordnance. It must be so. There is no check standing between the Chief of Ordnance and the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War has not, ordinarily at least, the sort of scientific skill that would enable him to produce any impression upon the views of the ordnance officer or to give him any material check in the following up of his wishes in regard to the character of ordnance that should be made or purchased, or any of those very broad powers that he is to exercise.

In later times, when the genius of the American mechanic has been greatly stimulated by the patent system and also by the improvements made in ordnance and arms of every description, there has grown up a controversy between almost ever inventor and every mechanic in the United States who has any interest in matters of this kind and the Ordnance Department.

I have had no connection with any of the committees of this body that enables me to trace thoroughly that controversy in its different stages, but I know since I have been in the Senate, having been at one time upon the select committee on ordnance and war ships, that different persons who are engaged in the production of material and arms and such like have been in communication with me more or less, and I do not remember a single instance, whether on the part of a producer of material or an inventor of arms, or a manufacturer of guns or arms, where complaint has not been made of the arbitrary powers that were given to the Chief of Ordnance and the arbitrary manner in which his powers have been exercised. It has gone to that extent that complaint, whether just or not, has brought forward in a very palpable way the question whether the Ordnance Bureau is not a close corporation and conducted in the interests only of officials of the Army. That is the question. It does not make any difference to me whether that question is properly stated or not by these gentlemen. What I know is that there is a strong prevailing opinion among the people of the United States, of the classes to which I have just referred, that justice is not done by the Ordnance Department, as I said before; that it is an arbitrary, dictatorial, unyielding assemblage of men who were disposed to favor their own class and men in military office to the exclusion and detriment of other men.

Now this bill as amended interposes between the Ordnance Office and the Secretary of War an advisory board, and I think, Mr. President, that that is a very essential part of our ordnance system. There should be an advisory board standing between the Secretary of War and the Ordnance Bureau. That advisory board seems to be well constituted. The very able man who is now at the head of the Army is put at the head of the board, and others are to be detailed, some from the Ordnance and some from the Engineer Corps and some from the artillery branch of the Army, and I think there ought to be one civilian in it. In order to make this exactly right and fair and make it satisfactory to our own people, there ought to be a civilian in this board. Then whatever complaints are made, the complainers would have a representative upon the board, and Congress would not only be saved a great deal of trouble and harassment, but I think the public service would be materially benefited.

The amendment, as I understand it, offered by the Senator from Connecticut would be merely to throw the whole power that has been in existence since 1815 into the hands of the Chief of Ordnance. I am not willing to see it go there. If I believed in him as being the greatest ordnance officer in the world and as being a man of immaculate honor—and I have no right to suspect him at all—I would not be willing for him to remain in the possession of these extraordinary powers at this stage of our progress and experience, because it is questioned by a large and very respectable class of American mechanics and producers of steel and iron and other matters connected with ordnance in this country.

I therefore think we should make a great mistake in conducting this system as it is; we should not meet public expectation; we should not be considered as giving a fair trial to American genius and enterprise if we should refuse to support the recommendation of the committee in this matter. I therefore hope, Mr. President, that that recommendation will be adopted.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose, indeed I know, that there has been more or less of the prejudice mentioned by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] concerning the Ordnance Bureau, but I say to him, what I think he will acknowledge on reflection, that the larger part of that prejudice is due to this: the Ordnance Department could only listen when an inventor came and could only say to him, "We can do nothing for you; we have not one dollar of money to spend upon this experiment." He came with a scheme whittled out in wood of a new gun.

A gun that has become famous in the world since first came to me as a wooden model, which was devised by an ingenious mechanic—I refer to the Spencer rifle—a bright Connecticut mechanic who had no money. Suppose he had brought that wooden model of the Spencer rifle to the Ordnance Department? The ordnance officer might have said "I see a bright future for this man, but I have not a dollar provided for this purpose and I can not make a gun for you;" and the man goes away and feels very naturally that he has been snubbed by his Government. So he has been snubbed by his Government, which ought to have a place where such bright men could bring these ideas, and there ought to be a little money there with which they could make experiments. It is the Government that is itself at fault in this matter very largely. There ought always to have been a board there of three bright men, an engineer, an ordnance officer, etc., especially to investigate and inquire concerning all new things. We are to blame; we have brought all the odium upon these men because they have represented their Government in saying "we can not do anything for you."

I hope the amendment I have proposed, saying that this shall not interfere with existing law, will be agreed to. The chairman of the committee thinks it wise, and I understood the gentleman from Kansas to say that he did not wish to interfere with the existing law. He has modified the bill already in many particulars in which it might have been liable to the charge of changing existing laws. Unless we suppose ourselves to be legislating and entirely wiping out old statutes and creating new, as a matter of caution this amendment ought to go in.

If we are changing existing laws creating this great department of the Government, it had better be done in a separate statute and more deliberately.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 8, noes 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote disclosing the absence of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-five Senators have answered to their names.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is it in order to announce here that only fourteen of them were Democrats?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I never said it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALL entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-six Senators have answered to their names.

Mr. TELLER entered the Chamber and responded to his name.

Mr. BROWN entered the Chamber and responded to his name.

Mr. DOLPH. As there appears to be but a small prospect of getting a quorum, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will not press that motion. I think in a few moments we shall be able to get a quorum. It is rather important that this bill should pass to-day, as we have already agreed to adjourn over to-morrow.

Mr. DOLPH. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. We shall have a quorum in a few minutes.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is detained at his home to-day on account of indisposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I ought to say respecting my colleague [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa] that he was not feeling very well, and supposing there would be no important matter this afternoon, he left the Chamber half an hour ago and returned to his lodgings.

Mr. FAULKNER entered the Chamber and answered to his name, completing the number necessary to constitute a quorum.

The following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Cullom,	Ingalls,	Reagan,
Bate,	Dolph,	Jones of Arkansas,	Riddleberger,
Beck,	Faulkner,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Berry,	George,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Blair,	Gorman,	Palmer,	Stewart,
Brown,	Hale,	Pasco,	Stockbridge,
Call,	Hampton,	Platt,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Turpie,
Coke,	Hiscock,	Pugh,	Walthall.
Colquitt,	Hoar,	Ransom,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-nine Senators having answered to their names, further proceedings under the roll-call will be dispensed with if there be no objection, and the Chair will again submit the question on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate insist on its amendments, and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DAWES, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

ALLOTMENT TO UMATILLA INDIANS.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 3506) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL. I introduce this bill at the request of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and I hold in my hand a communication stating the reasons why the bill should become a law, and I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD. It is very short. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and also the communication.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, August 24, 1888.

SIR: Referring to our conversation of this date regarding the Umatilla Indian reservation, and complying with your verbal request for a statement of the proceedings so far had by the Department under the law of March 3, 1885 (23 Stat., 341), which provides for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians upon that reservation and the granting of patents therefor and for other purposes, and, in order to do this, providing for a commission to ascertain the number of Indians on the reservation entitled to lands in severalty, the amount of land required to make the allotments, and the selection of so much of the lands in said reservation as will supply agricultural lands for allotments in severalty, together with sufficient pasture and timber lands for their use, and 640 acres for an industrial school farm, such tract so selected not to exceed "120,000 acres in the aggregate for all purposes," I have the honor to state that under and in pursuance of this law a commission was organized in the latter part of 1886, which proceeded to the reservation, secured the consent of the Indians to the provisions of the law, took the required census of the Indians, and selected a tract for a diminished reservation, containing in the aggregate 119,364 acres, of which, according to the census of the Indians on the reservation, 74,800 acres were required for allotment to the Indians for agricultural purposes.

The whole of the existing reservation was ordered to be surveyed for the purposes of the law, the agricultural lands selected for allotment to the Indians being subdivided as required therefor. This survey developed the fact that the diminished reservation as thus selected contained about 10,000 acres less of lands suitable for agricultural purposes than was required to make allotments to the Indians as provided in the law. It therefore became necessary to appoint a second commission to readjust the boundaries of the diminished reservation so as to bring within their limits a sufficient quantity of agricultural land to meet the requirements of the law.

This second commission has made its report, which is now pending before the Department, and the diminished reservation selected by them, and as defined and described in their report and outlined upon the map which accompanies it, shows a tract of land selected for the reservation so irregular in its shape and outline as would make it difficult for the Indians on the reservation or the white persons occupying lands adjoining it on the outside to know certainly and exactly the location of the boundaries of the reservation. This irregular outline of the boundaries of the reservation, running in a zigzag course, following the lines dividing townships, sections, and quarter-sections, including parts of sections and excluding other parts thereof, is reported by the commission to have been necessary in order to secure within its limits a sufficient quantity of agricultural lands for the purpose of allotment to the Indians, with a reasonable quantity of pasture and timber land for their purposes; and in doing this it was not found possible to locate the pasture and timber land as conveniently as might have been done had not the law restricted the diminished reservation to the limits of 120,000 acres.

The commission no doubt selected lands of the several kinds required by the law and for the purposes thereof in the most regular and convenient shape found to be possible by them under the restrictions and limitations prescribed. They, however, state in their report that they were not able to include as much timber land as they thought necessary within the reservation. And they further state that "while the Indians are some better satisfied with the present reservation than they were with the reservation fixed by the former commission, there is considerable dissatisfaction. They desired that all of the mountain lands in township 2 north, 35 east, and 2 north, 36 east, as far as what is known as 'Meacham Creek,' as well as the timber land in township 1 north, 35 east, and 1 north, 34 east, remain in the reservation, claiming that this had been promised them when the treaty was made. But as no agricultural land lies in these regions, it would have been impossible to have arranged the lines to embrace these lands and the diminished reservation contain at the same time a sufficiency of agricultural lands for the purposes of the allotment. In order to have included these lands the diminished reservation would have had to contain at least 50,000 acres more than the 120,000 acres to which the act of Congress limits it."

In view of the very irregular, undesirable, and unsatisfactory shape of the tract of land which has been reported to the Department by the commission appointed under the law for the purpose as the diminished reservation, and the reported dissatisfaction of the Indians in the matter, as above stated, I have hesitated to adopt the report and approve the tract selected as the diminished reservation for the Indians. Notwithstanding they have consented to the provisions of the law and to take their lands in severalty, I think their wishes to have the land designated by them on the east embraced in the reservation should be respected; and for this purpose I would suggest that the act of March 3, 1885, be so amended as to authorize the Department to select, prescribe, and define a reservation containing a sufficient quantity of land for the needs of the Indians and in such regular shape in outline as that its boundaries may be certainly known. This can be done very speedily and I think accurately and satisfactorily upon the results of investigations already made and reported upon by the commissions appointed under the act of March 3, 1885.

I submit herewith a draught of a proposed act to meet the suggestions above made.

Very respectfully,

H. L. MULDROW,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL,
United States Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

DISTRICT TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia; which was read:

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONERS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, August 30, 1888.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the Senate dated the 29th instant, the commissioners herewith transmit the annual report of Henry R. Miles, superintendent of the telegraph and telephone service for the year ended June 30, 1888.

Very respectfully,

W. B. WEBB,
President Board of Commissioners.

Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS,
President pro tempore of the United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Should not the report of the commissioners go properly to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move a reference to that committee.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I never understood before that the commissioners of the District of Columbia had a right to communicate directly with the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were called upon by resolution for that purpose.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did not know it; I beg pardon, but I think that the communication ought to go to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred, if the Senator moves it. Does the Senator from Virginia move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection, and printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. NEILL S. BROWN, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government;" and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT. I hope we shall go on with that bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution on the Calendar, reported from the Committee on Public Lands. It is Order of Business 2006.

Mr. STEWART. The regular order has been displaced so frequently that we feel constrained to insist upon it, unless we can have a unanimous agreement that it be taken up on Monday immediately after the morning business and disposed of. If we can have unanimous consent to take it up after the morning business on Monday, then there will be a full Senate and we can dispose of it. It has hung so long that it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. PLUMB. The measure I have spoken of is a House joint resolution, which will not take any time nor occasion debate.

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the agreement I have asked for by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLUMB. It is important for some reasons that there should be action upon the joint resolution immediately.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the morning business on Monday the regular order be taken up and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that on Monday at the close of the formal morning business the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if he will not be willing to modify his motion to take the bill up at the conclusion of the morning hour so as to allow the Calendar to be considered. It is now about two weeks since we have considered the Calendar, and it is important that something should be done with it.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I will say at the close of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be the order at that time.

Mr. STEWART. But I want to have unanimous consent that it shall not be laid aside until disposed of, because I do not want to be resisting requests to lay it aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator desires consent that the bill shall be proceeded with until it is concluded.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, without interruption.

Mr. PASCO. I gave notice this morning that I should ask to call up the resolution of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] in reference to the Louisiana election. I gave way to the fortifications bill, which has consumed the day; but I should like to have an understanding that I may have an opportunity to submit the remarks I gave notice of either on Monday or Tuesday morning. If it is the desire of the Senate to take up the Calendar or go on with the regular order on Monday, I will give way until Tuesday. I should like, however, to have it understood that I am to have the floor on Tuesday morning. I hope whatever the Senator from Nevada may desire that he will take into consideration my wishes in this matter.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator will see the propriety of disposing of the bill for the admission of Washington. We have had it pending as the unfinished business for a long time, and it is in the way of other business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the request to be now for unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the morning hour, to wit, at 2 o'clock, on Monday the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 12——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will permit the Chair to state——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object. The Senate in its concluding hours does not belong to any two or three Senators. There are a number of Senators here who have responsibilities resting upon them, and I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will permit the Chair to state the request. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the morning hour on Monday the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 12 and continue the same until it shall be concluded. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to anything having precedence.

Mr. STEWART. I will then give notice that after the morning hour on Monday I shall insist upon the regular order and it shall not be laid aside without a yea-and-nay vote. I shall insist upon it until it is concluded. I hope no Senator will consider me discourteous if I refuse to yield for anything, for I shall not.

KANSAS AGRICULTURAL-COLLEGE LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I trust the joint resolution to which I referred may now be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 12, the unfinished business, being now before the Senate, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] asks unanimous consent that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (H. Res. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to certify lands to the State of Kansas for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not want to object to the passage of any bill here that will be of benefit to any people in any State, but if it is a mere matter of RECORD speeches, I do most certainly object.

Mr. PLUMB. It is a matter which it is important should be acted upon.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Very well; then I shall not object.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to certify lands to the State of Kansas for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

OWNERS OF PRIVATE DIES.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1590, Senate bill 953.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. 953) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury and the proper accounting officers to restate, settle, and pay to the owners of private dies the balance of commissions due them was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury and the proper accounting officers to restate the accounts and settle and pay the balance of commissions due to the owners of private dies, or to their legal representatives, as provided in section 3425 of the Revised Statutes, on the full amount of stamps purchased, face value, without distinction as to the time when such purchases were made. Three hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is appropriated for payment.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will explain that bill somewhat.

Mr. HOAR. There is a report, but I can explain it in a moment. The private dies which were used by the Treasury, as appears in the report presented by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] were used under a certain provision of law, fixing the amount of commission which should be paid. The Secretary of the Treasury settled the claim upon his theory of the amount of commission. The owners of the dies claimed that they were entitled to a somewhat larger sum, and by an agreement with the Treasury Department, one of the cases was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States as a test case, and the Supreme Court decided—the case was carried up twice on some new point which was raised—that these people were entitled to their claim; and a communication was sent in by Secretary Folger asking that the claim be paid. Since then a communication has been sent in by the present Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretaries of the Treasury under two administrations have affirmed the validity of the claim. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle it.

Mr. ALLISON. I noticed from the reading of the bill that it provides for a settlement without reference to the time when these claims were filed. I may have made a mistake in that regard. I hope that the bill will be read again.

Mr. HOAR. They were all due and filed when the service was rendered, and it was agreed by all the claimants and by the Department that one test case should be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SPOONER June 13, 1888:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 953) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury and the proper accounting officers to restate, settle, and pay to the owners of private dies the balance of commissions due them, respectfully submit the following report:

A similar bill has been reported from the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives at this session. The report, which is adopted by this committee, is as follows:

Prior to the year 1883 the Treasury Department withheld, from certain persons who furnished their own private dies for printing revenue stamps, a part of the commissions allowed by law. The Supreme Court of the United States had twice decided that the commissions so withheld were illegally withheld, first on appeal from a judgment rendered by the Court of Claims dismissing a petition on demurrer, and again on appeal from a judgment on the merits, in the same case.

After the first decision was made the Secretary of the Treasury recommended to Congress the enactment of a statute providing for the payment of the commissions withheld, and transmitted to the House of Representatives a draught of such a measure. But at the request of the Assistant Attorney-General, who had concluded to try the same case upon a traverse of the petition, he subsequently suspended his recommendation to await the result of the second trial. The second trial having resulted in a second judgment by the Supreme Court declaring the commissions to have been illegally withheld, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue have both officially indicated their approval of legislation to authorize the payment of commissions so withheld.

"This case, then, is exceptional in character. It is not the case of an ordinary claim against the United States. The Supreme Court having pronounced the withholding of the commissions illegal, the Treasury Department, which withheld the commissions, finds itself without the means to refund them. There is no appropriation available for the purpose; and besides, the commissions having been withheld by [the] predecessors of the present incumbents of the Treasury offices, the account can not now be reopened, under the rules of the Department, without authority of law. The Treasury Department therefore approves the enactment of a law to provide the means for the payment of the commissions.

"The question presented is not whether Congress shall empower the Treasury Department to investigate and settle an ordinary claim against the United States, but whether Congress will adopt the recommendation by the Treasury Department of such legislation as shall enable that Department to pay specific commissions which have been unlawfully withheld, which commissions that Department finds itself unable to pay for want of the necessary appropriation, and by reason of the Department rule which interdicts the opening of old accounts by new officers."

The following is a statement in detail of the facts of the case. The internal-revenue acts allowed a commission of 10 per cent. in certain cases in favor of persons who furnished their own dies and purchased "at one time" stamps to the amount of "over $500" (Revised Statutes, section 3425). But the internal-revenue officers, adopting an erroneous interpretation of these statutes, allowed and paid such commissions in stamps, which was equivalent to 9 per cent. only in such cases. One per cent. of the commission allowed was thus withheld, in violation of the provisions of the statutes. The pretext for this illegal action was that the commission of 10 per cent. which the statutes allowed on the purchase of stamps was payable, not in money by abatement from the face value of the stamps purchased, but in stamps at their face value.

The first decision of the Supreme Court disapproving of this construction of the statutes was made near the close of the term which commenced in October, 1881, in the case of Swift Company vs. The United States (105 United States, 691). Soon after this judgment of the Supreme Court was rendered the Secretary of the Treasury sent to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives the following communication:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 8, 1882.

"SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith the draught of a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, authorizing the refunding of money to parties who have overpaid for their private die stamps, by reason of the former mode of computing and allowing their commission on purchase of said stamp, under section 3425 of the Revised Statutes, which mode, though in force about twenty years, has recently been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to be erroneous, as you will see by the inclosed copy of the opinion of the court in the case of the Swift & Courtney & Beecher Company, appellants, vs. The United States. The Commissioner has changed the mode of computing and allowing such commissions in conformity with this decision, and it would seem to be just that the amounts which have been overpaid should be refunded, as proposed by the Commissioner. If the inclosed bill meets the approbation of the committee, I would respectfully suggest that it be incorporated in some appropriation bill, or other appropriate bill, now pending, to insure its passage at the present session.

"Very respectfully,

"CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

"Hon. FRANK HISCOCK,
"Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives."

The following is the draught which was inclosed in the foregoing communication of the Secretary of the Treasury:

"The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized, upon proof satisfactory to him, to refund, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and pay back to those proprietors of articles named in Schedule C of the internal-revenue acts approved July 1, 1862; Schedule C of the internal-revenue act approved June 30, 1864, and Schedule A, following section 3437 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or in either of them, or in any amendment thereof, who furnished their own die or designs for internal-revenue stamps to be used especially for their own proprietary articles, all moneys received from such proprietors for such stamps imprinted from such dies or designs, which under a misconstruction of the statutes relating to discounts and commissions were in excess of the amount required therefor by law. But no claim for the refunding of such moneys shall be allowed by said Commissioner unless the same shall have been presented to him within one year next after the passage of this act."

The Assistant Attorney-General decided to traverse the petition in the Court of Claims, and to try the cause upon its merits. At his request the Secretary of the Treasury suspended the recommendation which he made in the foregoing communication until the ascertainment of the result of this second trial. After the second trial the case went again to the Supreme Court upon appeal, and in 1884 that court again disapproved the construction of the statutes which had been adopted by the revenue officers, and again held that 1 per cent. of the commissions allowed by law had been illegally withheld. This case is Swift Company vs. United States (111 U. S., 22).

Since the rendition of the last judgment of the Supreme Court the Secretary of the Treasury has transmitted to the chairman of the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives the following communication:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 23, 1886.

"SIR: In reply to your letter of the 19th instant in regard to the bill (H. R. 241) to authorize payment of balance of commissions due to owners of private dies, I have the honor to say that the records of this Department disclose nothing which is not fully set forth in the documents inclosed by you (herewith returned) and in the two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States (105 U. S. R., 691, and 111 U. S. R., 102). Accepting these decisions, I concur in the expression of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (whose letter to me of the 22d instant is inclosed) that I see no objection to the passage of the bill.

"Respectfully, yours,

"C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

"Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
"Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives."

In the foregoing communication of the Secretary of the Treasury was inclosed the following letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
"Washington, March 22, 1886.

"SIR: Referring to letter of Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER, chairman of the Committee on Claims, House of Representatives, inclosing bill and other papers relative to claim of private die owners for the refund to them of certain commissions withheld by this office, which were referred, under date of the 20th instant, by Assistant Secretary Fairchild, with the request that I return the papers with report as to whether I would recommend the passage of the bill, I have to state that the records of this office show that certain commissions were withheld from owners of private dies for stamps purchased by them in excess of the amount which the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Swift & Courtney & Beecher Company decided should be allowed, and I know of no reason why the parties having such claims should not be reimbursed the amount thus withheld. I therefore see no objection to the passage of the bill. The papers in the case are herewith returned.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

"H. C. ROGERS,
"Acting Commissioner.

"Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
"Secretary of the Treasury."

On the 21st day of February, 1888, the Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue transmitted to the committee the following communication:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
"Washington, February 21, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, in which you ask that the Committee on Claims be furnished with an estimate of the amount that would be required to pay claims under the provisions of bill inclosed (H. R. 1268), 'to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury and the proper accounting officers to restate, settle, and pay to the owners of private dies the balance of commissions due them.'

"You also ask for a statement of any facts in possession of this office touching the cause of the withholding of the commissions in the bill mentioned from the different claimants for the same, and state that any suggestion I may be pleased to make concerning the propriety of the proposed legislation will be duly appreciated.

"In reply I state that the section 3425, Revised Statutes, provided for certain commissions to be paid to owners of private dies on purchase of stamps from their dies, as follows:

"On amounts purchased at one time of not less than $50 nor more than $500, 5 per cent.; and on amounts over $500, 10 per cent. on the whole amount purchased.

"This office held that the commissions above referred to were payable in stamps, and they were so paid until the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Swift and Courtney and Beecher Company, decided that the same should be allowed in money, and not in stamps.

"The face value of stamps issued to owners of private dies up to May, 1882, was $56,650,000.

On which there was collected	$51,500,000
The amount which should have been collected under the decision of the Supreme Court is	50,985,000
Excess collected	515,000

"It is believed that judgments have been rendered in the Court of Claims in favor of a number of claimants for reimbursement of amounts paid in excess, and that some of the judgments have been paid; the amount outstanding, therefore, and for which an appropriation will be necessary in case of the passage of the bill, would be $515,000, less the amount paid on account of such judgments.

"This office has no record of the amount paid. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Swift and Courtney and Beecher Company, before referred to, decided that the amount withheld by this office should be allowed.

"It would seem to be equitable and just that the amount withheld from others on account of such commission should also be allowed.

"I see no objection to the passage of the bill.

"Respectfully,

"E. HENDERSON,
"Acting Commissioner.

"Hon. FRANK T. SHAW,
"Member of the Committee on Claims,
"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C."

The amount required to pay these claims is $350,142.59, as follows:

Excess collected by the Government, as shown by the Acting Commissioner's letter of February 21, 1888	$515,000.00
Less amount paid on judgments of the Court of Claims	164,857.41
Amount still due	350,142.59

The reason why these claims have not all been paid at the Treasury, since the final decision of the Supreme Court, is that, under the practice of the Treasury Department, the Comptroller can not, under the practice of the Department, allow an account which has been settled by a former Comptroller, even after a decision by the Supreme Court that such settlement was legal.

On the 27th of October, 1885, the First Comptroller of the Treasury, in an official letter to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, relating to a stamp account which had been presented for settlement, said:

"It appears from the records in this office that three of my predecessors have passed upon similar accounts, and one of them, Mr. Tayler, has passed upon the account of Swift and Courtney.

"Although the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that his statement was incorrect, as well as the statements of other Comptrollers on similar accounts, yet I am bound by their decisions. Should, however, a new case, involving the same principle, be presented, I should follow the opinion of the Supreme Court.

"I have heretofore held in a number of cases that the decision of a question or the statement of an account by any one of my predecessors, when he had jurisdiction on the subject-matter, could not be reopened or restated, unless some mistake had been made by him in matters of fact arising from errors in calculation, or in cases of rejected claims material testimony is afterwards discovered and produced. No mistake in matters of fact arising from errors in calculation having been made by my predecessors in these accounts, or material testimony having been discovered or produced since their decisions, I can not reopen the same because of an error of judgment in regard to the law of the case, or their construction of the statutes."

The reason why the claimants have not all sued the United States in the Court of Claims is, that under the arrangement between the claimants and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue then in office, the case of the Swift and Courtney and Beecher Company was made a test case, and the others were to abide the result. But that case was pending six years, and when it was finally decided the new Commissioner declined to carry out the arrangements of his predecessor, and the statute of limitations then barred these cases in the Court of Claims. Section 3425, Revised Statutes, provides that—

"The proprietor of articles named in Schedule A, who furnished his own die or design for stamps to be used especially for his own proprietary articles, shall be allowed the following commissions: On amounts purchased at one time of not less than $50 nor more than $500, 5 per cent., and on amounts over $500, 10 per cent. on the whole amount purchased."

The Supreme Court of the United States decided unanimously that the money asked for by this bill was wrongfully taken from the owners of private dies. Three Secretaries of the Treasury, three Commissioners of Internal Revenue, and the present First Comptroller of the Treasury have all signified their approval of some measure that will enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to return this money to its legitimate owners. H. R. bill No. 1268 was drawn up at the Treasury, and meets the approval of the accounting officers, and your committee, having examined into the matter very carefully, after taking into consideration the amount involved, have unanimously decided to report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. ALLISON. As I remember the matter, this money can not be paid to these people without some direct action of Congress because of what is understood to be the statute of limitations. I think that this is a case where if any statute of limitations exists, whether by rule of the Department or by law, it ought to be enforced rigidly.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement before he proceeds?

Mr. ALLISON. I only want to say a few words.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact found in a portion of the report that there was an agreement between the Treasury Department and these claimants that one case should be made a test case and the others abide by it. Thereupon one case was made a test case. Indeed, two cases went to the Supreme Court. Then, when it came back with the decision of the Supreme Court, the Department found itself unable to pay without authority of law, and sent a communication to Congress recommending the payment. That recommendation was not acted upon in Mr. Folger's time. It is now renewed by Mr. Fairchild. Does the Senator think that in such a case a statute of limitations should be insisted upon, and that the Government should refuse to meet the agreement?

Mr. ALLISON. I fail to find in this report any statement of an absolute agreement.

Mr. HOAR. You will find it near the end of the report.

Mr. ALLISON. This depends on a statute passed at the time of the passage of the internal-revenue laws in 1863. It provided that where a person manufacturing any of the articles mentioned in section 3425 of the Revised Statutes should furnish his own dies upon which the stamps should be printed, he might purchase any amount of stamps between $50 and $500, and he should have a rebate of 5 per cent.; and if he purchased in excess of $500 he should have a rebate of 10 per cent.

That was an improvident statute. It was a statute which enabled what for years was known as the match monopoly to exist; and it did exist for many years, because no small match manufacturer could afford to go in and purchase $500 worth of stamps. Thus the match business was thrown into the hands of a few people who secured a monopoly of the manufacture of matches; and although there was a 2-cent stamp upon each match-box the manufacturers purchased the stamps in $10,000 and $20,000 lots and received a rebate of 10 per cent. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue gave that rebate in the form of stamps instead of money.

That process went on for a great number of years. I had occasion to examine this matter for myself three or four years ago, and I only state it now from recollection. The process went on for many years with the absolute assent of the manufacturers, they receiving the stamps in that form. But at some time away on, after the law had been in force for ten or twenty years, somebody suddenly discovered that there was an opportunity to make 1 per cent., and then the case of which the Senator from Massachusetts speaks was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States and decided against the Government.

I see by the report that stamps were issued to the exent of $50,000,000 for these proprietary articles, and they had a rebate of 10 per cent., which was equivalent to $5,000,000 to the manufacturers. I am willing myself to pay to them whatever the law says we shall pay, but I do not believe that they stand here in a position to ask the Government for equity. There is no equity in their favor, and therefore unless the law gives them the money, I do not believe the Government of the United States is bound to give it to them.

Mr. BROWN. The stamps were 1 per cent. below par?

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry? I wish to know of the Senator how it was that these parties, having accepted a commodity in satisfaction of a debt—this rebate, of course, was a debt——

Mr. HOAR. They never accepted it without a protest.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask how it was that the stamps were not at par.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not now remember precisely how it was. This 1 per cent. was a very delicate operation.

Mr. MORGAN. For instance, if they accepted $10,000 worth of stamps in payment of the commission, as it is called, why were not those stamps worth $10,000?

Mr. ALLISON. They were worth it in the currency of the country all the time.

Mr. MORGAN. The question, then, is whether we are to pay for the depreciation of currency. Is that it?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; no such question as that is involved here. I have not the decision before me, and I have not now in mind the facts; but after this process had gone on for a long time somebody discovered that this Commissioner of Internal Revenue had not properly construed the law, and then a test question was raised. The law was repealed some years ago. I believe it was only repealed when we repealed the match tax. Senators will remember when that was done.

Mr. HARRIS. In 1883.

Mr. ALLISON. That was done in 1883. It was under that law that these match manufacturers were enabled to do what we all know they did do. The stamps were put on. Of course the consumers paid the amount of the tax. It was added, of course, to the price of the matches in those cases and in other cases.

If under the decision of the Supreme Court we are bound in law to pay this sum, of course I shall want to pay it; but if it is necessary to pass a statute in order to put them upon some ground whereby they can make this collection, I am opposed to it.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask a question? I think the Senator from Iowa will be able to answer it. I should like to know whether this was the situation: that any person who purchased stamps to a certain amount got 1 per cent. discount.

Mr. ALLISON. At one time they got 5 per cent. on amounts purchased of not less than $50 nor more than $500, and on amounts over $500, 10 per cent. on the whole amount purchased.

Mr. PLATT. That was where they furnished the dies.

Mr. ALLISON. Then there was another provision, which allowed the Commissioner from time to time to "deliver to any manufacturer of friction or other matches, cigar lights, or wax-tapers a suitable quantity of adhesive or other stamps, such as may be prescribed for use in such cases, without prepayment therefor, on a credit not exceeding sixty days, requiring in advance such security as he may judge necessary to secure payment therefor to the Treasurer of the United States within the time prescribed for such payment."

Mr. PLATT. Why is it that the Supreme Court held that when these parties were paid in stamps it was not a full payment?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not the decision before me and I do not recollect the exact ground upon which it went.

Mr. DOLPH. I suppose it went on the ground that it was considered as a purchase of 10 per cent., and therefore they were entitled to the payment of 1 per cent. on that purchase.

Mr. ALLISON. I think very likely that was it. Whatever our obligation is under that decision I am for paying, but I am not for paying one dollar beyond our legal and proper obligation. These people have no equity, and they come to us in no condition to ask the Government of the United States to grant them equity.

Mr. HOAR. If I can have the attention of the Senate for two minutes or thereabouts, I shall not abuse its patience any longer.

This is not the case of something which the Government promised to do for somebody else in the way of a payment of something; it is a case of over-taxation in substance, that is, the law saying that every man who takes $500 worth of stamps for a certain purpose shall have a rebate of 10 per cent., the stamps indicating the payment of a tax. Of course the tax is really only $45 and not $50, and the Government has got out of him more than it is entitled to receive.

That question has gone to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States, not once, but twice (the Attorney-General thinking of a further point and therefore carrying it up the second time), has decided that the Government owes this money to these people. Now, that is settled, and the fact which makes my honorable friend from Iowa, who would do an injustice to no man knowingly, prepared to say he is ready to pay it, exists.

How does it happen that, if these people have a debt against the Government, it requires a statute to pay it, is the next question. When the cases went up they made their claim that they had been overtaxed, and that the Government had taken out of them $500 when it should have taken only $450 plus 99 per cent. of the remaining $50; that is, it paid back to them in stamps worth so much less. Thereupon the Secretary of the Interior agreed with them "if instead of bringing five hundred suits you will only bring two to test the question, I will pay you the money according to the decision of the Supreme Court."

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my statement. If that be true, is it proper that we should keep the faith of the Government so pledged by the Secretary of the Treasury? Is not that a reasonable and a proper arrangement to make? It saves the Government costs by the hundreds and thousands of dollars. It saves this enormous apparent litigation on the statute.

Mr. Folger says he made that bargain with these men, and just as soon as he found the case was decided he wanted to pay them, but in looking into his authority he found he had not authority under the appropriations to make the payment from the Treasury without an act of Congress. He thereupon wrote a letter to Congress, drew a bill in the Treasury Department, and asked for authority to keep his bargain. Then when Mr. Folger died, the act not having been passed at that time, Mr. Fairchild sent in another letter to us and said, "I have looked into this matter. My predecessor made this arrangement, and I can not pay the money for two reasons. In the first place, I have not an appropriation, and if I had I could not go back and pay something which my predecessor said he could not pay without an act of Congress. Now I ask you for an act of Congress." Mr. Fairchild's language is:

Accepting these decisions, I concur in the expression of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue—

Who also mentions the same thing—that I see no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me one moment, this matter comes to my mind gradually, because I had occasion to examine it some years ago. The large manufacturers of cosmetics and proprietary articles under the law were authorized to pay money in advance and receive stamps. It was their custom for many years to transmit to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a thousand dollars, for instance, and he would transmit to them a thousand dollars in stamps, covering not only the commission of 10 per cent. in stamps, but covering the whole amount. That process went on, the accounts were settled and adjusted from time to time, and afterwards the practice of giving bond was also used in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has taken more than a minute. I thought he rose for a question.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. HOAR. Go on.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I took the Senator off from his argument; but I thought he rose for a question.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. What I have to say is this: I do not understand that the question whether I keep my promise depends on the character or merit of the man to whom it is made.

Mr. ALLISON. Just read the promise.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that it depends on my character solely whether I shall keep the promise or not; and I do not understand that the question whether the Government shall keep its promise, or its officers who are charged with the transaction of its business shall be sustained in reasonable cases in keeping theirs, has anything to do with it. These men were overtaxed, whether they were manufacturers or whether they were wealthy men or poor men; and the Supreme Court of the United States said so. Here is the finding in the report submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]:

The reason why the claimants have not all sued the United States in the Court of Claims is, that under the arrangement between the claimants and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue then in office, the case of the Swift and Courtney and Beecher Company was made a test case, and the others were to abide the result. But that case was pending six years, and when it was finally decided the new Commissioner declined to carry out the arrangements of his predecessor, and the statute of limitations then barred these cases in the Court of Claims.

Mr. ALLISON. Where do you read from?

Mr. HOAR. I read from the last page of the report. Of course the new Commissioner could not carry it out for the reason which was stated previously in the report.

That is the whole situation, and I can not conceive a case which could present itself to a man of honor, if he were dealing with the case of his own agents, if he were a business man, which could possibly be more plain and cogent and stringent in its obligations in every sense, a just claim, a claim of overtaxation decided by our supreme tribunal on hearing and rehearing, consideration and reconsideration, to be the due of these men. Whether they are great manufacturers or little, whether that was a reasonable law or not, the United States owes that money to those men just as much as it owes any dollar bill or any Government bond.

That is the first proposition; and the second proposition is that the reason why they did not sue in the Court of Claims is because the representatives of the United States desired them not to do so, and agreed that if they would not sue these cases should be the test cases. That has been done, and that is proved by the authority of two successive Secretaries of the Treasury, one who framed the bill and the other of whom sends in a recommendation to pass it.

Mr. HAMPTON. Is it a House bill?

Mr. HOAR. No; it is a Senate bill. There was a similar bill reported in the House unanimously from the House Committee on Claims, and the pending bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Claims of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I only express my own view as respects these claims. If this payment is to be put upon the ground that these claimants were misled by the proposition of the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, it is not that they were misled.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. One part of the Senator's argument is that we are bound in honor to pay these claims, because their owners had an understanding with the Secretary of the Treasury that there should be one test case.

Mr. HOAR. There were two test cases.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, two test cases, and if those cases went against the Government, then the Secretary of the Treasury would pay all these claims. Whatever obligation there is on our part because of that promise, I am willing to fulfill; but if such promise was made it does not appear from any letter or statement of a Secretary of the Treasury. I venture to say that a full examination of the facts will disclose that the payment of this immense amount of $50,000,000 had gone on for fifteen years or twenty years, before any claimant ever suspected that he had a claim for 1 per cent.

Mr. HOAR. Where does that appear?

Mr. ALLISON. That does not appear anywhere in the report, but it appears in the situation.

Mr. COCKRELL. Read the letter of Secretary Fairchild. You will see it there.

Mr. ALLISON. It appears in the situation, which is that here was a statute passed in 1863 and it was not until 1882 that this question was raised—twenty years afterward.

Mr. HOAR. Twenty years after the passage of the statute, not twenty years after the claim had arisen.

Mr. ALLISON. This bill proposes to go back twenty years and restate an account that must have been stated in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and assented to by these people. That is the point I make.

Now, I say that there can be no equitable obligation upon the Government of the United States to open cases twenty years after the discovery of an erroneous statement of accounts had been made. Those men accepted the settlements and statements as made, and they ought to be bound by them; and especially ought they to be bound by them when they have no equitable claim upon the Government. They do not stand here in the position of having equity. They stand here in the position of men who took advantage of a statute greatly in their favor.

Here was a die costing $2, or $5, or $50, if you please, upon which the stamps were printed, and because they owned that die and paid their money in advance they were able to secure 10 per cent. discount. I say that in my belief and judgment they have no equity. If I can be shown a statement whereby the Secretary of the Treasury promised that if the Supreme Court decided the question against the Government he would open these cases from the beginning and restate every account, then I shall feel bound, with the Senator from Massachusetts, in honor to pay this money. But I do not think any such record can be shown.

Mr. HOAR. I have great respect for the opinion of the Senator from Iowa, and if his opposition to the bill now remains resting solely upon the point that the statement in regard to this agreement with the Government made in the report is not verified by any documentary matter, I am willing to let the bill go over until that is verified, because it can be verified.

Mr. ALLISON. My point is that if the Secretary of the Treasury made this agreement, and it shall be shown that my construction of the statute is not a correct one, all those who buy stamps hereafter will be entitled to the new construction; but surely no Secretary of the Treasury would be willing to go back and readjust an account involving $50,000,000 without a most careful examination.

Mr. HOAR. Let me call my friend's attention to another point. He speaks as if these were twenty-year old matters. The bill only authorizes payment to those who bought stamps under a certain section of the Revised Statutes which was passed in 1874, so that it can not go back of that.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was only a continuation of the old law.

Mr. HOAR. But whether it was or not, the bill limits the payment to that period of time, and this comes up to May, 1882. If the objection from the Senator from Iowa would be removed by an amendment providing that no claims of this kind which were not presented to the Treasury Department within a certain time, six years from May, 1882, when the case was carried up, I have no objection to that; or if the Senator's point is, as I understood him first to make the point, that he doubted whether there was any documentary evidence of this agreement, that can be produced. He now says he is satisfied the agreement took place.

Mr. ALLISON. No, I am not satisfied. I said if the agreement took place I knew nothing about it. I presume there may have been an agreement about a test case—a Secretary of the Treasury might make such an agreement; but as to the other point, would a Secretary of the Treasury make an agreement that would authorize anybody to readjust accounts of twenty years' standing?

Mr. HOAR. If the question is one of doubt in the Senator's mind as to the agreement of the Treasury Department, and whether it existed, let the bill go over until the documentary evidence can be produced. To that I have no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will allow the bill to go over, and I shall look into it further. It may be that I am mistaken about the question of an agreement.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say that I have no personal knowledge of this matter. I received a letter from gentlemen in Boston (I do not know what their occupation is), asking me to speak to the Senator from Wisconsin who made the report and call the bill up. The gentlemen are strangers to me. On looking at the report it seemed to me so absolutely plain a case, and knowing that the Senator from Wisconsin is out of town, I called it up in his absence.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that my attention was called to this case by one of these claimants some three or four years ago. He brought his case before me and I examined all his papers. He wanted the amount inserted in one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. HOAR. That is what the Treasury Department recommended.

Mr. ALLISON. It is probable that the Treasury Department recommended that course. The person to whom I refer had a claim under the statute of, I think, $60,000, it may have been twice that amount; it was a large sum of money. It required, as it seemed to me upon that examination, legislation to enable him to secure the money, and I did not believe that the Government of the United States was under any legal or equitable obligations to provide that legislation.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will resume its place on the Calendar. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will permit an executive session. I believe there are some nominations. Are there not?

Mr. BERRY. No, I do not think there are.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 3, 1888, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 31, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMER SAGINAW.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 3364) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw of New York.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries have unanimously reported a bill which is an exact copy of the Senate bill. I have carefully examined them; and I ask unanimous consent now to place the Senate bill upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read now, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Benison, owned at the port of New York, State of New York, by W. P. Clyde, an American citizen, and rebuilt by him in the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States under the name of the Saginaw.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to authorize and direct the inspection of said steam-vessel, steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and the appurtenances of said boiler, and cause to be granted the proper and usual certificate issued to steam-vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that said steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests to be applied on the inspection of said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances will be the same in all respects as to strength and safety as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes, save that the fact that said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances not being constructed pursuant to the requirements of the laws of the United States, and are of unstamped iron, shall not be an obstacle to the granting of the usual certificate if said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances are found to be of sufficient strength and safety.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time was passed.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill (H. R. 10904) on the same subject will be laid on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were read twice and referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 3475) granting the use of certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma for the purposes of a public park—to the Committee on the Public Lands; and

The bill (S. 3482) to authorize the construction and operation of a wagon road across the Pike's Peak reservation in the State of Colorado—to the Committee on Military affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GROUT, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, for fifteen days after to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, indefinitely, on account of serious illness.

To Mr. ERMENTROUT, for two weeks, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of W. W. Wilkinson, on House bill No. 8224; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. I now call up the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. This matter was presented to the House several days ago, and the report was printed by order of the House.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to yield to me for a moment to allow me to offer a resolution of inquiry touching the printing of a certain public document.

Mr. FORNEY. Will it require any considerable time?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; it will take but a few moments.

Mr. FORNEY. Very well. I yield to the gentleman.

STATISTICAL REPORT ON WOOL AND WOOLEN MANUFACTURES.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit at this time the resolution I hold in my hand, and which I will read:

Whereas the following concurrent resolution was delivered to the Public Printer on the 30th day of July, 1888:

"That there be printed 17,000 copies of the recent special report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department upon wool and the manufactures of wool, as follows: 10,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives; 5,000 for the use of the members of the Senate; and 2,000 for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department:"

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to make inquiry and inform the House when the documents ordered to be printed by said resolution will be delivered at the folding-room, and the cause of the delay on the part of the Public Printer in printing the same.

I want to state in this connection that this was delivered to the Public Printer on the 30th day of July, and the report in question was corrected on the 1st of August. It is a document for which we have all of us many inquiries, as it is a matter of much interest to a great many persons. It was printed and the pages stereotyped months ago; and, as I have said, the corrections have been made in the plates, and there is no reason, as I am informed, why it should not have come back to the House within two days after the adoption of that resolution.

I do not offer this resolution, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of finding fault with the Public Printer, except merely to get the document in question.

Mr. WEAVER. What is the document?

Mr. CANNON. It is the statistical report relating to wool and the manufactures of wool.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the chairman of the Committee on Printing does not seem to be present. This appears to be a resolution directing that committee to make the inquiry.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to offer the resolution for present consideration?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, I shall be glad to have the resolution passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TAULBEE. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been read by the gentleman from Illinois himself, but the Clerk will again report the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I think this had better go to the Committee on Printing. Therefore I object to its present consideration.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will not interpose an objection. This is simply to secure the document without delay.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The resolution recites certain facts of which the House is not fully informed. It is a matter which should be investigated by the committee, and I think it proper that they should act upon it first.

Mr. CANNON. It is a matter that I have myself investigated. It passed on the 30th of July, and the corrections were made at the Treasury Department on the 1st of August. The plates were stereotyped before the resolution passed and but few corrections made, and I am informed there is no good reason why we should not have had it within a day or two after the resolution was passed. I had an inquiry made this morning and could get no information at the Bureau of Statistics when it would be delivered. It is a very important document, and we are all having inquiries for it constantly. My only object, I repeat, is to get the document.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I am not prepared to controvert the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, but it is a matter that should be inquired into.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution H. Res. 219, being a joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I call up the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report. It has been printed for three or four days, and I suppose all members who desired to do so have obtained a copy of it.

Mr. COBB. I object.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

During the reading,

Mr. COBB said: I desire to withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be with the understanding that the statement will be read.

The statement, which has already been printed in the RECORD, was again read.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the adoption of the report as to the amendments which have been agreed to in conference, and then we will insist upon a disagreement to the other amendments; and any gentleman who desires to speak on all matters to which we have disagreed will have ample time to do so.

Mr. COBB. I desire to attack a part of the report to which the conference committee have agreed.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to ask what is the motion?

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to agree to the report. The Chair will state the situation. In this report the conferees on the part of the House and the conferees on the part of the Senate have agreed to certain matters, while as to other matters they have disagreed. If the report is adopted the result will be that all those matters as to which the conferees have reached an agreement will be settled and no longer open for further consideration, while those matters as to which the conferees have disagreed will be open for further conference and such further action as the Senate and House may take. Therefore any gentleman who desires to oppose any part of this report in which there has been agreement must oppose the adoption of the report, because it is one entire proposition.

Mr. NELSON. I want to continue my question a little further. Is not this motion to adopt the report amendable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. After the report has been agreed to or disagreed to further proceedings may be had, as the Chair has just stated. The report can not be amended.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, the part of the report to which I object is that action as to the amendment of the Senate numbered 134. I send to the Clerk's desk certain papers to be read, after which I will state the ground of my objection to the report as it stands.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, August 28, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of 27th instant, referring letter of Messrs. Lamar and Zachry, in opposition to an item in the sundry civil appropriation bill appropriating $40,000 to the Wea, Peoria, etc., Indians, for the reason that there would not then be left sufficient funds of said tribes to satisfy any judgment on certain claims pending against them, and asking to be advised if the statements made in said communication are correct, and what, if any, necessity exists for said appropriation at this session of Congress.

In response thereto I transmit copy of a communication of 28th instant from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to whom the matter was referred.

Very respectfully,

H. L. MULDROW,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. J. E. COBB,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., August 28, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt by your reference, for report, on the 27th instant, of a communication from Hon. J. E. COBB, inclosing a letter from Messrs. Lamar and Zachry, in opposition to an item in the sundry civil appropriation bill appropriating $40.00¢ for payment to the Wea, Peoria, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians, and assigning as reasons therefor that H. R. 8074, which passed both Houses of Congress at the present session, and which is now in conference, authorizes those Indians of said tribes, who became citizens under the treaty of 1867, to bring suit in the Court of Claims for an amount claimed to be due them, estimated at about $73,000, on account of a fraudulent or erroneous distribution heretofore made; and that there will not be left in the hands of the Government sufficient funds of said tribes to satisfy a judgment for the full amount claimed

Mr. COBB asks to be advised if the statements made in said communication are correct, and what, if any, necessity exists for said appropriation at this session of Congress.

In reply I have to report that the statements made by the attorneys are in the main correct, but that this office did not originate the amendment to the sundry civil bill for the relief of said Indians.

It is known to this office that the delegates representing the bands named based their petition for the payment of their invested funds on the ground that they were greatly impoverished by reason of failure of crops and loss of cattle, etc., by disease.

The tribes named have a general fund amounting to $77,300, and a school fund amounting to $20,700, aggregating $98,000, being investments in non-paying State stocks, namely: Florida, Louisiana, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

The letter of Mr. COBB, with inclosure, is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

A. B. UPSHAW, Acting Commissioner.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. COBB. It appears from that communication that this amendment added by the Senate did not originate with the Indian Office, and it does not receive the assent of that office. The circumstances of this matter are simply these: In 1867 there was a treaty between these Indians and the Government of the United States. By the provisions of that treaty those of the Indians who desired to do so were permitted to become citizens of the United States and to sever their tribal relations. It was also provided that all those who became citizens should receive their pro rata share of certain funds which belonged to the tribe as a tribe. It was further provided that there should be taken a list of the Indians who became citizens and a list of those who were to be removed under the treaty to the Indian Territory. These lists were taken, and those who became citizens under the provisions of the treaty, about fifty-five in number, now complain that there was fraud practiced in taking these lists.

They say, and they are prepared, as they allege, to prove it, that there were only about fifty-seven of the Indians who removed to the Territory, whereas the list taken showed one hundred and sixty-four. Now they say that this was a fraud, and that as soon as they discovered it, which was some years after the transaction, they first applied to the Indian Department and were told that no relief could be given them there. Then they came to Congress and applied for relief; and at this very session a bill has passed the House and is now in conference providing that these Indians may go before the Court of Claims and make good, if they can, the assertion that they make of fraud in taking the lists.

If they succeed in establishing their claim in full, they will be entitled out of the fund now in the Treasury to some $73,000 in addition to the amount they have already received. The Senate amendment provides that $40,000 of the money now standing to the credit of these Indians be immediately paid to those who have removed, under the treaty of 1867, to the Territory; and such payment would leave but a small amount of money out of which the citizen Indians can be paid if their claim is just.

They say that they are entitled to $73,000. If this sum of $40,000 should be taken from the fund, it will leave nothing comparatively to pay the amount which they claim to be due.

Mr. Speaker, there is no necessity, as it seems to me, for adopting this amendment. The Indian Department appears to think there is no necessity for it. That department has not recommended this payment. The agent of these removed Indians went before the Senate and in some way got this amendment put on the House bill, and the conferees have agreed to it; but it puts the citizen Indians in the attitude of prosecuting a claim without the prospect of realizing anything if they are successful in obtaining judgment.

The whole matter resolves itself into this question: Whether this Congress will allow these citizen Indians to prosecute a suit to establish a fraud and at the same time by adopting this report deprive them of any result to be attained by the suit? If these men are right there has been a fraud committed, a palpable fraud, which ought to be rebuked by this Congress. If they are not right, the Indians who are now asking the payment of $40,000 will only be delayed a little while in getting their money. So that, looking over this whole matter, it does seem to me we ought to pause here and not pay this money to these Indians until this contention is settled in the courts. We have sent the citizen Indians there, but we send them there in vain if this conference report is to be adopted, because, although they may establish their claim, there will be no money left out of which it can be satisfied. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will refuse to adopt this conference report.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the attorneys themselves who represent these citizen Indians could have presented a stronger case than the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] has presented for them. My information as to the origin of this claim agrees precisely with the statement of the gentleman from Alabama; that is to say, that under the treaty of 1867—I think that is the date of the treaty—the Peoria Indians were permitted, as many of them as chose, to become citizens, and the others to retain their tribal relations and be removed into the Indian Territory. A list or census of these citizen and tribal Indians respectively was taken. It is now claimed that the census of the tribal Indians was fraudulent; that it contained more names than there were actual members of the tribe.

This, Mr. Speaker, is something that happened a quarter of a century ago. A claim of this kind was preferred by the citizen Indians, if I am correctly informed, about three years after the treaty was made——

Mr. COBB. And, as they allege, as soon as they discovered the fraud.

Mr. RYAN. I am not complaining that there has been any dereliction on their part. They preferred a claim; I am unable to say whether it was in the same amount as now presented or not; but my information is that it was far less. According to my information that claim, when the evidence was all fresh before the Department, was examined thoroughly, and rejected by the Indian Office.

Mr. COBB. For the reason that the Indian Office said they had not authority to rectify the mistake or correct the fraud.

Mr. RYAN. Even though the Indian Office found there was fraud, and I am not advised it did find anything of the kind, but, on the contrary, rejected the claim upon its merits.

Again fifteen years ago these citizen Indians preferred the same claim to another administration. The claim was again carefully examined in the Indian Office and again rejected. So it stood until the present time, when the employment of these attorneys seemed to make this a propitious occasion to renew this old claim. They came here to Congress. Congress sent them to the Court of Claims. Now it is protested here by these attorneys that though these tribal Indians have nearly $100,000 to their credit in the Treasury——

Mr. COBB. They have not so much.

Mr. RYAN. They have $98,000.

Mr. COBB. No, sir. Twenty thousand dollars of the fund in the Treasury can not be touched; it is an educational fund.

Mr. RYAN. It is an educational fund; but it is the fund of those Indians resulting from that treaty and is responsive for any fraud which may have been perpetrated, if it was perpetrated by these Indians.

Mr. HERBERT. What did the Court of Claims do on this question?

Mr. RYAN. The Court of Claims, as I understand, has not yet investigated the case at all.

Mr. COBB. But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the twenty thousand dollar fund is not liable for the payment of this claim.

Mr. RYAN. Why not?

Mr. COBB. Because it has been set aside by the act of Congress itself for educational purposes alone; it is a trust fund for that special object.

Mr. RYAN. But does it not grow out of the same treaty fund?

Mr. COBB. It grows out of the same treaty; but in paying this $40,000 you do not propose to use any part of that $20,000?

Mr. RYAN. That is true as to this appropriation. If my information is correct, this claim is baseless. It is a claim that has never received favorable consideration by any of the authorities that have examined it, and yet it is maintained here that these Indians shall not now have even $40,000 of their own funds to keep them from starving, to rebuild their houses and their barns that have been swept away by cyclones, to enable them to purchase cattle to replace those which have died from Texas fever, and to enable them to purchase food, as they are compelled to do, owing to the failure of the crops for the last three years. I am informed also by an eminent Senator, who has given this subject careful consideration, that there could not possibly be, giving the benefit of every possible doubt to these citizen Indians, an amount over $12,000. In addition to that I am informed that these tribal Indians in the Indian Territory who are provided for here have an excess of about 10,000 acres of land over and above their allotments, which is to be sold, and the proceeds of which would be responsive to any judgment that might be obtained in the Court of Claims in this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated all the information I have upon this subject. I do not believe there can be any possible prejudice to these citizen Indians by making this provision for these tribal Indians who are in the condition I have described. I understand, also, that this matter was examined in the Indian Office and this appropriation approved. I understand further that it was examined by the Indian Committee of the Senate and approved, and also that it was examined in an informal way by the Indian Committee of the House and approved. This letter of the Department which has been introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] indicates from its date some degree of energy on the part of these attorneys in securing it, but in that letter there is no disapproval of this appropriation. I know nothing more about the matter than what I have stated. I believe the statement I have made to be correct. I have no more feeling about it than I have about any other amendment in the bill. We agreed to it because we understood the facts to be as I have stated. The delegates here representing these Miami and Peoria Indians handed me, before we went into conference, a statement and asked me to submit it to the conference committee for their information. I did not have occasion to do that, in fact I do not know that I thought of it at the time; but if it was a proper matter to be brought to the attention of the conference committee it is proper now to bring it to the attention of the House, and I will therefore ask to have it read from the Clerk's desk as presenting the views of the tribal Indians through their delegates, whose names are appended to the paper.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 17, 1888.

SIR: You will please pardon us for intruding upon your time, but in view of the fact that the interests of the people we represent are at stake we are compelled to make a statement to you, and through you to reach, if possible, the conference committee on the sundry civil bill. We understand through Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, that representations have been made by an attorney here that the Peorias are largely indebted to the citizen band of that tribe, and that the Peorias should have none of their money paid out to them until the matter is settled by the Court of Claims. The separation between the two bands of Peorias took place twenty-five years ago, and the claim now made or revived was started about three years after the division took place. It was investigated and found groundless by the Indian Office. Another attorney then took it up, and about fifteen years ago it was again investigated by the Indian Office, and again was it decided absurd and having no foundation. We are now confronted with this baseless claim again, and money that is ours alone, and which we need to assist us at a critical time, may be possibly withheld from us simply at the request of an attorney who has no other warrant for making it than the statements of former persons who had this absurd claim in charge and which was disposed of as stated. But to go into the merits of this matter would make this letter too long and tedious. We wish simply to say that the bill for the allotment of our land now before the Senate (House bill) provides for the adjudication of this claim. We have had, however, propositions from these said citizens to compromise. We have refused, being determined that this matter shall be finally settled by the courts for all time to come.

We have in the hands of the Government, in all	$97,000
We ask under present amendments to sundry civil bill	41,000
Balance on hand	56,000
Under our allotment bill we leave 10,000 acres, worth	50,000
Assets remaining to tribe	106,000

You understand no claim is made as against our land. The claim is that fraudulent names were used to increase the Indian list at the time of separation, thus reducing the shares of the citizen Indians. We therefore think you will see we have ample means to meet any allowance that may be made for citizens (if any) after paying out the $41,000, for you can see that if any fraud was perpetrated by the addition of names to Indian list, that the sum covered by such additional names would inure not only to the citizen Indians but to the Indian band as well, in proportion to the numbers of each, and that on the basis of the tribal property at the date of separation twenty-five years ago, subsequent payment to Indians would have nothing to do with it. But we know there is no foundation in truth or justice to the claim made. Were it not for the fact that for the last three years our crops have been destroyed, our cattle killed off by Texas fever, and our losses this year by cyclone of houses, barns, and fences, and the probable failure of crops again this season we would not ask this money. But we need it to pay debts, to live on, and to rebuild and repair with. To withhold this money on the claim made, when we have the ample means still in hand, is to cause us useless suffering and hardship. We are sure no member of either the Appropriations or conference committees wish to do this or to be unfair to us. We respectfully ask that you submit this to the committee. One other thing we wish to say, that in all money matters the Miami and Peoria Indians are separate and distinct. Their land is in common but not their money.

Very respectfully,

JOHN WADSWORTH,
Delegate Peorias.
THOMAS F. RICHARDVILLE,
Delegate Miami Indians.

Hon. THOMAS RYAN,
House of Representatives.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, after hearing that communication read, it is very easy to conjecture from what source my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] obtained his facts. He alleged that this matter had been examined carefully by the Indian Department and rejected upon its merits, and there in that communication is his proof.

Mr. RYAN. I did not state that as a positive fact. I stated that such was my information.

Mr. COBB. Information derived from this communication from these Indians who are interested.

Mr. RYAN. I got the information from that and from other sources also. I did not, however, go to the Indian Office to make inquiry about it.

Mr. COBB. I want to say before I go any further that members of this House ought not to be prejudiced in this matter because there are attorneys representing these claimants. I am not the representative of any attorney, nor am I the representative of the citizen Indians. I have no more feeling and no more interest in this matter than the gentleman from Kansas, or any other member of the House.

Mr. RYAN. I trust the gentleman did not understand me as intimating that he had.

Mr. COBB. No, you did not do that; but you rather emphasized the fact that the citizen Indians had employed attorneys.

Mr. RYAN. Yes; but I do not want my friend to infer from any remark of mine that I intended to state or intimate that he was representing attorneys here. On the contrary, I know the gentleman to be far above that.

Mr. COBB. I did not understand the gentleman as intimating that I had any special interest or anything of that kind; but the mere fact that there are attorneys employed in this matter ought not, I say, to prejudice the case in the least in the minds of the members of this House, because it was entirely proper that it should be brought to the attention of the committees of this House or to the House itself by men capable of presenting it properly. Now, I look alone to the case as presented; but I am not willing to take facts from these interested parties. I go to the Indian Office direct, and before I was willing to act at all in bringing the matter before the House, I sought certain information from the Indian Office, which I have here. The answer of that office clearly discloses the fact that the only fund out of which the money claimed to be justly due by these citizen Indians can be recovered is about $77,000. The $20,000 can not be reached. The $20,000 is a sacred trust-fund set apart by Congress for educational purposes, and is not to be reached by the claims of these citizen Indians, or by any other claims. There is no doubt about that.

So far as the land matter is concerned I have no information on it, and the Indian Department tells us nothing about it. The Indian Department tells us $77,000 only are liable to be appropriated for the satisfaction of the claims of these citizen Indians. The claims amount to $73,000. So that if this $40,000 is appropriated you only have $4,000 out of which to pay a judgment of $73,000. This is the condition of the matter; this is the money side of the case.

Let us see for a moment whether it is just and right we should listen to the claim of these citizen Indians or not. The policy of the Government, Mr. Speaker, is and has been to encourage these Indians to sever their tribal relations and to become citizens of the United States. It was in pursuance of this policy that this treaty of 1867 was entered into with them. Every inducement was held out to them to break their tribal relations, and to enable them to obtain citizenship. Ought the Government of the United States to practice a fraud or sanction a fraud against the men who have adopted the very policy which it has urged upon them? And that is the question here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will not do to say such and such is the fact unless we have proof. There is not a scintilla of proof before us to sustain the position assumed by my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN]. Not a particle of proof; but on the contrary, the evidence presented, so far as we have any, directly controverts the position he assumes. Look to the action of the Government itself.

We passed a bill not long since to allow these citizen Indians to go into the courts. Then was the time for the assertion to be made that there was no use of sending them to the courts. Then was the time to say "your claim has been investigated; your claim has been rejected by the Department time and again; the facts on record show you have no grounds on which to base an appeal to the courts of the country." Who made that point then? It was not made on the floor of the House, but we passed the act by which they were permitted to go into the courts to prosecute their case, and to determine whether or not the fraud charged has been or has not been committed. There is the attitude in which we are placed. We said to them, by the act passed, there is sufficient evidence before us to make it reasonably probable that a fraud has been committed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after turning them over to the courts, is it proper and right that we should turn round and destroy the very fund out of which payment is to be made to them, if they are correct in the assertion of their claim. You have sent them to the court. You told them they may be heard there; and now you propose to turn over to others the fund out of which they are to be paid if they recover judgment. I do not say these citizen Indians are right in their claim. They say so, and we have sufficient evidence to cause us to suspect it to be so, otherwise we would not have allowed them to enter the courts.

Where is the necessity to pay this money over to the Indians claiming it? They say they are in a suffering condition. We have no proof of it. I might enter a clear denial and demand proof. The burden is on them in that respect. They produce nothing but the document just read, which is worth nothing.

Mr. RYAN. I think it is hardly fair to say a document of that sort is not worth anything. It comes from the duly authorized representatives of these Indians. It makes out a prima facie case. The gentleman has no right to say the representation made by their representatives as to their condition is not true.

Mr. COBB. If we are acting in a judicial capacity——

Mr. RYAN. We have the statement from the Secretary of the Interior that their representatives have made the same representations to the Department as to the condition of these Indians. There is nothing to overthrow that statement.

Mr. COBB. No; but, Mr. Speaker, I am not accustomed in my experience in the courts to accept as proof the bare assertion of a party directly interested in the accomplishment of a result. If it is true as a matter of fact, then it seems to me that better and less suspicious evidence could have been produced. In fact, this is no evidence at all. It is simply a part of the pleading. Now bring the proof. You have not got it. I enter denial for the citizen Indians; and their representations are certainly worth as much as those of the other side. But it is only a question of a few months' delay, and that is all.

If the bill which we have passed, and which is now in conference, becomes the law of the land, it will take but a short time to adjudicate the question of fraud. We will be prepared to act upon the matter in a very few months. There is not that condition of affairs prevailing which would prompt us in the face of a solemn assertion of fraud to make haste to do this thing demanded of us, rather than delay for a few short weeks, or months at best. I say the House will act inconsistently if it takes this report in view of legislation that has preceded it. I believe it is in the interest of fair and even-handed justice that the payment of this money should be held up for a short time until an adjudication of the pending controversy can be made.

Mr. FORNEY. I now ask the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. COBB. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COBB. In reference to one of the matters in conference, I wish to ask if the committee have disagreed upon the Senate amendment appropriating money for education in Alaska?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes.

Mr. COBB. That being disagreed to goes back to the conference, I suppose?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir; and you may speak upon it as long as you like after the adoption of this report.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the one hundred and nineteenth amendment proposed by the Senate. I believe that has not been agreed to yet, and I wish simply to call his attention and the attention of the House to the fact that it involves a proposition which may require an expenditure of from fifty to one hundred millions of dollars before the final consummation of the work proposed in the bill.

Mr. FORNEY. Let us get the report adopted first, and then we can revert to that matter.

Mr. SAYERS. Does this not come in here properly?

Mr. FORNEY. No, not until after the adoption of the report.

Mr. HITT. Is that the irrigation feature?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

The question being taken on the adoption of the report of the conference committee, the House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 4.

So the report was adopted.

Mr. FORNEY. I now move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments, as numbered in this report, and agree to a further conference.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, what amendment was referred to in the gentleman's proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All of them.

Mr. FORNEY. There are twenty-seven amendments disagreed to, commencing with No. 105, all of which are enumerated on page 13 of the report.

Mr. SYMES. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry—whether or not it is proper to ask for a division or a separate vote upon each proposition where a motion is to be made to recede with an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to a separate vote on any one of them.

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman can move to agree to amendment 119, I presume that being the one to which he refers.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 256, relating to the proposed zoological garden, and agree to the same. At the proper time I wish to be heard on that amendment,

I yield now to the gentleman from Colorado, simply having made this motion that it may be pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that perhaps it will be better to take up the amendments in their order, as several suggestions have been made in regard to them.

Mr. FORNEY. Very well, then; I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 105.

Amendment No. 105 was read, as follows:

(105) To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Mrs. Mary H. C. Baird, widow of the late Spencer F. Baird, $50,000, in full compensation for the services and expenses of the said Spencer F. Baird during his administration of the office of Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, including rent of rooms for the use of said Commission from February 25, 1871, to the time of his death, in August, 1887.

Mr. RYAN. I suggest to my colleague that he pass that over for the present, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] desires to make some observations upon it.

Mr. FORNEY. Very well; I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over informally.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Amendments numbered 106 and 107 were read, as follows:

(106) UNDER THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

(107) International boundary survey, United States and Mexico: To enable the President to execute and complete the engagements of the convention of July 29, 1882, between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, providing for an international boundary survey to relocate the existing frontier line between the two countries west of the Rio Grande, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the said survey and relocation of the monuments, to be performed by officers of the Army under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That all records, maps, field-notes, and computations in connection with said survey shall be deposited in the Department of State as an international record; and the money hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be needed, and also the money appropriated for the same purpose by the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1885, shall be disbursed and paid by the Secretary of State, on the requisitions of the Secretary of War, from time to time as it may be required.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question in regard to this amendment under the appropriation to complete the international boundary survey between the United States and Mexico. Can the gentleman inform the committee what portion of the boundary line between the United States and Mexico is contemplated in this provision?

Mr. FORNEY. My colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], is familiar with that question and can give the gentleman the information.

Mr. BURNES. In reply to the gentleman from Texas, I have to say that this is a survey, or intended survey, of the boundary line between Mexico and the United States from the Rio Grande River west to the Pacific Ocean, and it is not, as many have supposed, a proposition to survey the line between Mexico and this country from Paso del Norte south or east to the Gulf of Mexico.

In 1882 there was a convention between the Government of Mexico and the Government of the United States, and by the terms of that convention a survey of the boundary between the United States and Mexico was to be made at the joint expense of the two governments, each paying one-half. Under that treaty a Mexican party and an American party, each from the army of their respective countries, by appointment were to meet at Paso del Norte and pursue and mark the line from that point to the Pacific Ocean.

The Mexican party failed to put in an appearance until probably four or five days after the time appointed for the departure of the expedition. They then appeared at Paso del Norte, and were informed that the American party had gone on, and requested them to follow and join further along. For some reason they failed to join the American party; but the American party went through, marked and designated the boundary line, which was reported to the Forty-eighth Congress as entirely satisfactory to the Government of this country and to the Government of Mexico. But the Government of Mexico has never paid any part of the expense of this survey. A full and complete report of this survey or reconnaissance and its record were transmitted to the Forty-eighth Congress by the then Secretary of State, Mr. Frelinghuysen, and an appropriation something like $400,000 or about that sum was asked or estimated therefor.

It was urged by Congress that Mexico ought to supply one-half of the amount and this Government half. But the Department wanted the whole of the money. The House committee declined to appropriate the whole of the money, and advised the Secretary of State at that time to collect one half of the money from Mexico and then we would pay the other half. Nothing seems to have been done until the Forty-ninth Congress, when $100,000 were appropriated to pay our portion, or a part of our portion, of the expenditure. That money has never been used and never been paid out. It has remained up to date an idle appropriation.

With these facts before us, to appropriate $100,000 additional would seem absurd; and in my judgment it is absurd to take any further step until by a convention—now to be made, because the limitation of that convention, as to the performance of the work, has expired—the two nations have agreed to pay, and do pay, the money required for the contemplated work in the first treaty. For these reasons, because the line has been already agreed upon and marked, and because the Government of the United States has done its part of the original convention of 1882, and because the Government of Mexico has done nothing, it would be unbusiness-like, if not folly, for us to appropriate $100,000 more. These are the reasons why we have resisted, and now resist, the Senate amendment.

Mr. LANHAM. Has it any reference to the line between Texas and Mexico on the Rio Grande?

Mr. BURNES. None whatever; on the contrary, it is from the Rio Grande westward to the Pacific.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is not this appropriation recommended by the Department?

Mr. BURNES. It has not been recommended by the Department to this House, so far as I know. I presume it has been recommended by the Department, in some way, to the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Has not $100,000 been heretofore appropriated and not used because it was insufficient for the purpose sought?

Mr. BURNES. I do not know the reason why it was not used.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think it has been stated that they did not enter upon the expenditure of $100,000 because it was insufficient for the end sought.

Mr. BURNES. Whatever the reason may be I would state that we can not do this now until there is a new treaty made, unless we desire to release Mexico from a share of the cost. By the terms of the convention of 1882 the completion of this work was limited, I think, to two years, possibly three, but the limitation has expired; and if we go on and do this work now without a new convention, what assurance have we that the work will be satisfactory to or accepted by Mexico and that Mexico will contribute under the provisions of the old treaty which has expired?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There has been no work entered upon at all.

Mr. BURNES. The work that was entered upon was paid for out of the Army appropriations because it was the work of a detachment of the Army. They marked the line. They pursued it from Paso del Norte to the Pacific Ocean, clear through.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The Department has recommended this additional appropriation that the Senate have put on this bill. I merely called this to the attention of my colleague for information more than for any other reason.

Mr. BURNES. I will say to my friend and colleague that he may be right about it and I may be wrong; but there is no question in my mind with regard to the necessity of a convention between the two governments before we can perform this work, unless we wish to pay for it all. In other words, if we do it now, Mexico will not be bound for its half of the cost unless they choose to pay it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not desire to antagonize the recommendations of the conference committee at all, but I understand that there is a region of country there of from 5 to 10 miles in width where people do not know whether they are under our Government or under another flag, and it is very important to have that question determined at an early day so that our people can know with certainty whether they are buying land from the States or locating on the domain of another power. The importance of that consideration has impressed itself upon my mind, and while, as I have said, I do not desire to antagonize the recommendations of the conference committee, I believe this is a matter that ought to be pressed to a settlement without delay, so that the boundary lines of the United States shall be accurately and certainly defined.

Mr. LANHAM. I fully concur with what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has said. In a report by the Committee on Foreign Affairs at the present session of Congress I find this statement:

A survey of the boundary was made under the treaty, and the actual boundary was then what was the middle of the river. Since that time it has shifted its channels so often and so far, in some cases gradually, in others abruptly by cut-offs, that no man knows accurately where the boundary is to-day. The channel will sometimes move slowly, by accretion on one side and erosion on the other. Sometimes the stream will suddenly cut a new channel, abandoning the old ones altogether, and in a single day, by cut-off, a tract or a "banco" of 100 acres will be found on the other side of the river.

Mr. BURNES. My friend from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] is reading from a report which relates to the necessity of a survey from Paso del Norte to the Gulf.

Mr. LANHAM. That may be true; but what I desired was to ascertain whether or not the boundary between Texas and Mexico was contemplated by the Senate amendment.

Mr. BURNES. This says in express terms, "west of the Rio Grande."

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BURNES. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand that a convention was made, and that under that convention it was intended that two parties should join to lay out this line, but that our party did lay out the line, the other party being a few days late. But I understood the gentleman to say, after making that statement, that the line thus laid out was accepted, or acceptable to the Mexican Government. Is that correct?

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir. The Mexican Government expressly assented to the survey or reconnaissance which was made by our party alone. They were satisfied to let our people go on by themselves, saying that the result would be satisfactory to their Government, and my information is that we were advised by the Department of State four or five years ago that Mexico was entirely satisfied with the work that had been done, notwithstanding the fact that her party did not pursue the line through.

Mr. ADAMS. It would follow, then, that the expenditure of this money would be mainly for the erection of monuments to mark the boundary. Is not that so?

Mr. BURNES. In answer to my friend from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], and also in reply to my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], who asked substantially the same question, I desire to say that monuments have been there for twenty or thirty years, probably not as fine monuments as "sixty millions of people" would desire, but monuments which serve all practical purposes, though perhaps they are not so numerous as they ought to be. All along the line there are monuments, but in the report of our party, which I have read, I found that they recommended certain additional monuments to be placed here, there, and elsewhere.

Mr. ADAMS. I did not mean that the money was to be used for the purpose of erecting more stately monuments, but rather for the purpose of completely defining and marking out the line established by the reconnaissance or survey to which the gentleman has referred, in order that, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has suggested, settlers should have no difficulty in determining on which side of the international line they were locating.

Mr. BURNES. There are monuments there, but it does not follow that a man can recognize the line at any particular point where he may happen to strike it. No man can find even the line of his own quarter-section of land at every particular point. But within a given distance there are monuments now existing which were deemed sufficient to mark the boundary after the war with Mexico, and by following from one of those monuments to the other the line can always be defined.

When the location of one monument has been ascertained, or rather when two have been fixed so as to give the direction, any one can determine the boundary between the two countries on two or three hours' investigation. The boundary might not always be before a person rushing backward and forward across the imaginary boundary line, but he could pursue and find the boundary in a couple of hours anywhere.

Mr. ADAMS. Of course. But if it is true, as the gentleman has said, that the reconnaissance is made, what remains to be done about that boundary line? And why did the gentleman say, as I understood him to-day, that something ought to be postponed until a further convention? What use for a further convention?

Mr. BURNES. Well, we have agreed with Mexico under the convention of 1882; and it seems to have been settled in the public mind and the Congressional mind that there ought to be some monuments marking this line, and that a considerable sum of money—estimated, I believe, as high as $100,000—should be expended in placing these additional monuments along the line which has been pursued and marked. Now, if we undertake to carry out this plan, which has been agreed upon between the two governments, one-half of the expense of which is to be paid by each—if we undertake to do this without a new convention, the old one having expired, where is the obligation which will justify us in demanding of Mexico a repayment of one-half of the expenditure?

Mr. ADAMS. That is exactly what I wanted to have clearly brought out. If we make this appropriation and go on under it, we shall get all the benefit for which the work is done except that we shall have paid more than our share; and the object with which the gentleman would have action postponed until a further convention is not that we may get a better boundary line or better or more numerous monuments on that boundary line, but that we shall be enabled to make Mexico pay a share of the expense.

Mr. BURNES. That is all there is in it. Allow me to say there never has been any dispute between Mexico and this country with regard to that boundary line. There is now no dispute between the two nations concerning it. The only question is whether by putting up more monuments we shall make it more distinct, more readily discernible for the benefit of our people and the Mexican people and for the sake of the good neighborship which should exist between the two countries. To that policy we stand committed. But I say we should not go on carrying out that policy until Mexico has given her consent by some contract or assent.

Mr. ADAMS. And what the gentleman seeks to gain by postponing the advantages of a good boundary line, well marked out, is that we shall get a certain sum of money from Mexico to assist in paying the expense.

Mr. BURNES. So far as that is concerned, let me say this to my friend from Illinois: We are not going to perish from the face of the earth because we do not put up a few more monuments on this boundary line within a month or two, or because we do not put them up while the information in regard to the subject is certainly very incomplete and imperfect. As the matter stands at present, true business policy dictates that we should have a convention and settle this question with regard to the work, and then do it. I am perfectly willing to have it done.

But we can readily get those facts; the Secretary of State can furnish them, I have no doubt. And before doing so he will have time to perfect a contract by treaty or otherwise for the payment of the work. Hence, I say that the policy pursued by the House conferees in the conference on this question ought to be approved by the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State has for years been insisting upon this appropriation, and that without further treaty. He has insisted that if this money were at command, these monuments would be established and the boundary line at certain points relocated. I do not myself know the facts; but if there is any dependence to be placed upon the Secretary of State—and, by the way, our Secretary of State agrees in this matter with the former Secretary—if any dependence is to be placed upon the executive officer having special charge of this question, this survey can not be completed, the line relocated, and monuments established until the additional sum of $100,000 is appropriated. An appropriation of $100,000 was made in 1885; but it is not sufficient.

Having said this much, I am, of course, perfectly willing that the House should do what it pleases about this matter. My opinion is that the amendment is a proper one. The estimate has been coming in for years. Still I am perfectly willing that the next Secretary of State should have charge of the expenditure of this money.

Mr. ADAMS. Will my colleague say what reasons were given by the Secretary of State in favor of prompt action in this direction?

Mr. CANNON. I understand in a general way that the Secretary of State claims there was a treaty made, I believe, in 1882, and that the treaty has not been carried out by the establishment of this line; that he desires to carry it out, to plant these monuments and relocate the line, so that the boundary may be well ascertained. I must confess that I am relying upon the estimate and recommendation of the Secretary of State. I know nothing about the matter except as my knowledge comes in this way. I might say further that, as to many of these appropriations and estimates, Congress is forced to rely upon the recommendations of the executive officers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House insist upon its disagreement to this amendment and agree to the further conference?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read the one hundred and tenth amendment, as follows:

Strike out:

"That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives, acting conjointly, shall, within thirty days after the passage of this act, invite from eminent architects, not exceeding five in number, designs and general specifications for a building for the Library of Congress, to be erected on the site purchased for that purpose in the city of Washington, the cost of building not to exceed $3,000,000; and the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the above-named committees, to pay for the said designs and general specifications. The said committees shall jointly report to Congress its action in the premises on or before the 20th day of December, 1888. That the work now in progress on the building for the Library of Congress shall be suspended, and the commission authorized by act of Congress approved April 15, 1886, be, and the same is hereby, dissolved. That the property purchased for a site for the Library of Congress, including the buildings thereon, together with all plans, records, and other property of the United States connected with the building for said Library of Congress be, and the same is hereby, transferred to the care and custody of the Interior Department, the expenses of such care and custody shall be paid out of any money already appropriated for the construction of the building for the Library of Congress."

And insert:

"For continuing the construction of the building for the Library of Congress, including the compensation of all parties employed in connection therewith, as follows: Architect, assistant architects, engineer and superintendent of construction, and skilled draughtsmen, civil engineers, and such other services as the Chief of Engineers of the Army may deem necessary for the prosecution of the work, and shall specially order, together with such mechanics and laborers as may be necessary to carry into effect the appropriation herein made for construction of said Library building and to be paid from such appropriation, for the construction of the western front of the building and reading-room, and the book repositories connected therewith, as shown by sketch termed 'Plan No. 1,' on file in the office of the Librarian of Congress, $1,000,000. This appropriation and all appropriations hereafter made, and all sums available from appropriations heretofore made for this purpose, shall be expended under the direction and supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, who shall have the control and management of all of said work and the employment of all persons connected therewith. And all contracts for the construction of said building, or any part thereof, shall be made by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and the commission provided for by act entitled 'An act authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library,' approved April 15, 1886, is hereby abolished, and the duties of said commission under said act are hereby devolved upon the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and hereafter, until otherwise ordered by Congress, no work shall be done in the construction of said Library except such as is contemplated in the sketch or 'Plan No. 1,' herein referred to, and all contracts for work or materials outside of the space covered by said plan are hereby rescinded. And all loss or damage occasioned thereby or arising under said contracts may be adjusted and paid by the Secretary of the Interior out of the sums heretofore or hereby appropriated. All sketches, plans, and computations heretofore made or hereafter made respecting said Library building, or any part of the same, shall be the property of the United States."

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House further insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] in charge of the bill moves that the House further insist on its amendment.

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to ask one question. If the amendment of the House be agreed to, the work will be suspended and the commission provided by the act of Congress will be dissolved, and the property will be turned over to the Interior Department for custody. Suppose that amendment becomes the law, would the committee which is required to report on the plans submitted by eminent architects on or before the 20th of December next, if the rules of the present Congress remain as they have been construed at this session—would any appropriation for the new building for the Library of Congress be in order to any general appropriation bill? The purpose has been authorized in consequence of an act the result of diligent work on the part of the Committee on the Library for the last ten or fifteen years. Finally we succeeded in passing a law providing for the construction of a new Library building. As the appropriation is authorized by law at this time, an appropriation would be in order to an appropriation bill; but if the provision put into the bill by the House should become a law we would be exactly where we were ten or fifteen years ago. If the committee should present an appropriation for the new Library building it would not have the privilege of the Appropriation Committee, and therefore it would not be in order on a general appropriation bill. The work would have to be gone all over again. While I do not object as to the proper way of erecting the building, yet I should regret to see the House take such action in reference to the new Library building, so much desired, as to put us back exactly where we were before the Library building law was passed, for every one admits something should be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] labors under a mistake. The amendment of the House does not provide that the law providing for the building of the new Library building shall be repealed, but merely provides for doing away with the commission provided in that law. The law in all other respects will remain in force, and the property will be turned over to the Department of the Interior for custody for the time being. If the building is ultimately constructed the indications are that Congress will place it under that accomplished gentleman, General Casey.

Mr. ADAMS. The Committee on the Library are to report on the new plans presented before the 20th of December next.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, and that is the only extent to which the Library building law is repealed, so far as now proposed. Now, I hope the committee will non-concur in the Senate amendment. No act has ever passed Congress involving so large an expenditure with less consideration than the one providing for the building for the Congressional Library. Although the subject has been before Congress for many years, yet when the bill was passed it was done under the suspension of the rules, and the House acted on information which is found to be utterly at variance with the facts. The distinguished and honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Singleton] who was chairman of the House Committee on the Library would not have willingly deceived the House as to the real character of the enterprise; he was undoubtedly deceived by some one. A distinguished gentleman connected with the Chicago library, its librarian, and other gentlemen connected with the great libraries of the country, I think—although I am not authorized to speak for them—will cordially agree in the House proposition that other plans shall be considered for this proposed Library building. I believe it is agreed generally the policy recommended by the House committee is the true policy.

There is no hurry. The contracts now being fulfilled are limited entirely to what is known as "Plan No. 1," and neither the House nor the Senate seem disposed to interfere with carrying out that portion of the work which has been contracted for. I may state that there are two contracts to be carried out as to this Plan No. 1, one for the concrete foundation and the other for the terra-cotta pipes. The first contract for excavation has been already completed.

Mr. MAISH. I wish to propound an inquiry to the gentleman from Indiana with reference to this matter. Do I understand that the proposition of the House committee is to abandon entirely the plan upon which considerable progress has already been made?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; not exactly that. I will state to the gentleman that up to the time when Mr. Secretary Vilas became Secretary of the Interior the building was being constructed upon the plan known as "Plan No. 2;" that is to say, it embraced the entire building.

The House understood, and the commission seem to have commenced on the same idea, that it would cost about $3,000,000. The excavation of the entire site had been made. A contract for concrete foundation was entered upon, and also a contract for terra-cotta piping at the same time; but when Secretary Vilas came to look into the matter he determined to confine operations to what is known as "Plan No. 1," which is the west front of the building proper and the reading-room, otherwise known as the "rotunda." He restricted the operations of the commission to this limited building and the balance of the enterprise was abandoned.

That action seemed to be within the scope of the law, and so at present the contracts are being fulfilled to the extent of that plan known as No. 1, involving, as I have said, the concrete foundation and the terra-cotta pipes. The balance of the work is in what may be called a state of suspension. There will be some money to be expended yet, because the proposition of neither the House nor the Senate repeals the appropriations heretofore made for that purpose or suspends existing contracts referred to; but the effect will be to delay matters excepting in so far as I have already explained until the meeting of Congress again, at which time, if the provision of the House is accepted, new plans will be submitted and Congress can determine then with certainty whether it will pursue this Plan No. 1 or adopt an entirely new plan. I am not, as gentlemen know, in favor of constructing the building. I stand by the present Congressional Library in the Capitol, but I am assuming that, in some form, Congress will go on with this work. If Congress acts upon the views of those in charge of the great libraries of the country generally I think it will adopt a plan materially different from that in progress, but it may be without any material change in the character of the structure to be erected except as to costly embellishments.

Mr. HOOKER. Permit me to ask the gentleman from Indiana if there is any proposition in the bill to interfere with the appropriation of $2,700,000 heretofore made by a former Congress for this work?

Mr. HOLMAN. There has not been that much appropriated, $500,000, towards the erection of the building; the total amount to be appriated for the purpose according to the plan as understood would be about that sum, but only $585,000 has been appropriated for the site, and I believe $500,000 towards the erection of the building; but there is nothing to interfere in either Senate or House proposition at least with that appropriation to the extent of carrying out the existing contracts for the concrete foundation and terra-cotta pipes on plan No. 1. These contracts are not affected at all either by the provisions of the House or Senate.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Indiana, that this matter ought to be considered very fully and carefully by the House of Representatives before final action is taken. I do not know how others may feel who were members of the Forty-ninth Congress when this bill passed providing for the erection of a building for additional accommodations for the public library; but speaking for myself I opposed the passage of the bill from its introduction until it was presented for adoption under a suspension of the rules, and passed. Then I simply refrained from acting on it on the day of its passage because of personal statements from the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Singleton, then chairman of the committee, and others, which seemed to be based on definite information as to the cost. I have felt since then, with the slight information that has come to me, and from what I have been able to ascertain, that the House of Representatives was the victim at that time of false pretenses on the part of those having charge of the matter and furnishing the committee with information they gave us.

I remember as well as I remember anything that one of the principal factors used in the argument in support of the bill before the House was the economy of the plan adopted by the House as compared with others that had been suggested. For the accommodation of the Congressional Library various schemes or plans were presented to Congress which usually involved some change of the Capitol building, and estimates were made under a commission appointed in 1880 to determine the cost of changing the Capitol for the necessary accommodation of the public library. As I remember, not having the figures at hand, the report was something in excess of $4,200,000 for each of the various plans of change of the Capitol. It was conceded that something was necessary to be done, and finally it was agreed that a separate building should be constructed. But I remember distinctly that it was stated time and time again on this floor, and was embodied in reports made to the House by the select committee on the subject, that the cost of the building upon careful and full estimates made by the commission who had the matter in charge was about $2,300,000.

Mr. RYAN. Two million three hundred thousand dollars with an ultimate addition of some $700,000.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, $2,323,000, with a possible excess above that of some six or seven hundred thousand dollars, to be finally used for iron shelving, etc., as it might be needed.

Mr. HOLMAN. In some of them. The report made last Congress and made to the Forty-eighth Congress, the whole amount, involving the $800,000 for years to come, would be little over $3,223,000.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not recollect about the report, if I understand the gentleman.

Mr. RYAN (to Mr. PAYSON). That is exactly as you have stated; and it is correct.

Mr. PAYSON. The whole cost of the building, according to the Singleton report, was to be $2,300,000. It required an appropriation of only $500,000 outside of that required for the site the first session. The next session Congress was to appropriate $1,000,000, and the third session thereafter $800,000, which, exclusive of the site, would complete the building for occupancy, finishing the rotunda and central building and connecting rooms, leaving only some shelving to be added as needed. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, we find from the reports which are now made, and upon the debates had upon this amendment at the other end of the Capitol, that the lowest estimate that is made, and the lowest opinion that is volunteered by anybody, is that it will cost $10,000,000. Some high in authority think it will go up to as much as $18,000,000.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. To be expended within the next one hundred years in the completion of the plan?

Mr. PAYSON. I am coming to that a little later. I am talking about the amount submitted at the other end of the Capitol by the gentlemen in charge of this bill, who fix the lowest estimate at $10,000,000 for the completion of the plan; and the assertion is not gainsaid and I have seen no statement made that it will not run up as high as $16,000,000 or $18,000,000 for the completion of this building. The observations made by the gentleman from Indiana indicate that two plans are now being considered—Plan No. 1 and Plan No. 2. But as I understand from what I glean in the newspapers and from what I have heard stated about it, Plan No. 1 is simply a portion of the plan provided for in this plan submitted by Mr. Smithmeyer.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Plan No. 1 involves the west front; the reading-room and the rotunda, and will cover about one-third of the ground. Plan 2——

Mr. PAYSON. That is a portion of the general plan of Smithmeyer.

Mr. HOLMAN. This Plan No. 1 will cover about one-third of the ground and about one-half of the expense, inasmuch as the rotunda is a very large and costly construction.

Mr. PAYSON. That is only one step in completion of the Smithmeyer plan. Now, it seems to me a proposition ought to be submitted to this House, and it ought to be settled whether or not the House of Representatives desires at this time to approve this proposition as it is presented. That is to say, the construction of this building confessedly will involve over the expense of the site upon which it is located an expenditure of not less than ten or twelve million dollars, and may reach sixteen or eighteen million dollars, and running through a period of years longer perhaps than an ordinary generation, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY].

Whether or not the House ought not to have information from gentlemen who know about this question, as I say I am giving information that I have got, a piece here and there from inquiry and from the public press. The conferees of this House in the next meeting of a conference shall reflect not their own views but those of this body, as a committee should express it, in order that there shall be a full explanation of this matter. What have we got for the amount of money expended here now, or attempted to be expended? We have got a hole in the ground with an immense expenditure in money that has gone into it. We have a magnificent fence there, built better than the average house in the country in the State in which I live. One building on the northeast corner of the block has been reserved for the office of the architect and those associated with him. That building has been fitted up for the comfort and convenience of the architect and his corps of employés at an expenditure of about $2,000. I happen to know that building. In it at the time of its condemnation there lived an old and valued friend of mine who for a number of years represented a prominent district in the State of New York on this floor, a man of affluence and means, and it was regarded as a first-class residence. In it has also lived for a number of years a distinguished Senator, and it was regarded as sufficiently comfortable for him. But just as soon as it is purchased for this purpose it requires $2,000 to fit it up so as to make it sufficiently comfortable for Mr. Smithmeyer and his corps of employés.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to inquire whether the changes were not those which would adapt this building, though it was comfortable as a dwelling-house, and make it a proper place for the scientific work necessary to be done in forming the plans of a great national building.

Mr. PAYSON. The character of the improvements I do not know.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, I do.

Mr. PAYSON. Then the gentleman might be able to state what the necessity for them was.

Mr. KELLEY. You say they were suggested for the convenience of this man. I suggest that they were made for the exigencies of the duty required of that officer.

Mr. PAYSON. Then, if the gentleman knows, I would be glad to have him state what they were.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to state to the gentleman that if he will go over to that building he will see in large rooms, made by breaking the partitions between small ones, tables on which have been drawn and prepared scientific plans for the construction of the building, at which he may look and see the shape of every stone that is to go into it, the size, the number which brings it into precise relation to the stone below, above, and on either hand. He will see the preliminary work executed as thoroughly and as scientifically as it can be done or could have been done by any body of architects and engineers and their assistants on the face of the globe.

Mr. PAYSON. I submit to the gentleman that is not shedding very much light upon the precise point.

Mr. KELLEY. It is shedding light upon the necessity for the changes and showing that they were not made for the indulgence of a Sybarite, but for the convenience of an architect.

Mr. PAYSON. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that it seemed to me that there was a good deal of public money being expended in this matter in an extravagant and unauthorized manner. By looking at the same report I see that among other things thought necessary in the erection of this public building was the purchase of a pair of horses and a coupé, at an expense, with some livery charges added, of $1,408. There are other things of like character, and it looks to me as though this entire scheme which the House of Representatives has been committed to by its action in the last Congress is designed to fit up a "soft place" for an architect for the rest of his natural life.

I do not believe that any architect who ought to be employed to erect a stable, let alone a great public building, should be retained in any employ who presents to his employer a detailed plan for a building which he asserts will cost at the utmost $2,300,000, and then, within a year, states that it will cost over $10,000,000. That is to me utterly and absolutely inexcusable. Other gentlemen may not regard it as I do; but we all know that the public Treasury is full to overflowing, and that the Government is regarded as a great goose which can be plucked by almost anybody who can get a Government contract from competent authority. When the bill for the erection of this building was presented to the House two years ago, I had a suspicion, which now amounts to absolute belief, that Congress was committing itself to a scheme the extent of which would never be known until it was thoroughly completed; and if in its infancy this kind of development is being made, what may we expect hereafter? It is conceded now that the building is to cost at least from ten to twelve millions over and above the site, and if any such estimate had been before the House when the bill was under consideration how many gentlemen who were members of the Forty-ninth Congress will now say that a dozen votes could have been had for such a bill, let alone a vote of two-thirds, to pass it under a suspension of the rules.

This building will now confessedly cost more than the State, War, and Navy building; and who, sir, supposed we were voting for such a building when we passed this bill in the Forty-ninth Congress? No one, sir. I doubt if the bill would ever have been reported even, then.

I remember very well the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Otho Singleton—and a more honest man I never had the pleasure of serving with—asserting on numerous occasions in conversation with gentlemen on both sides of the House, that these estimates were carefully and guardedly made, and it was stated in the report which was submitted to the House in connection with the bill, that the estimates were of that character, and that the estimated cost, $2,300,000, would not be exceeded; yet we are now confronted with an official statement that $10,000,000 will be the minimum, and that the cost may run up to $12,000,000 or $15,000,000. Now, before the committee shall again go into conference I think it is due to the members of that committee and to this House that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], having charge of this bill, as well as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who is upon a committee which has investigated this subject, and who doubtless has under his hands now details of all this information, shall communicate that information to the House.

I think the House should be informed in regard to all these details, so that it may determine whether it would not be wise policy even now to abandon everything that has been done up to the present time, and to start in with a clean sheet and with advice from somebody else besides Mr. Smithmeyer, the architect of the building now under process of construction. We can cease operations now with a small loss, if thought desirable, and I certainly favor doing so. I trust the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will give the House the benefit of whatever information he has on this subject and an explanation of the difference between the situation now and the situation as it was understood to exist a year and a half ago, in order that we may determine whether we shall go on with the construction of this building upon what is known as Plan No. 1, and, if we do so, whether it is possible to do anything else than complete the building, Plan No. 1 being an integral portion of the entire plan presented to us by this architect when the bill was passed.

I am in favor of a building for this library—one which shall be suitable for future needs of the country and appropriate in its architecture; but, sir, I desire to know its approximate cost before I vote to build it, and feel that the agent of the Government is reliable in judgment and statement.

This, thus far in this building, we have not in my judgment had, for it is, in my opinion, impossible to reconcile the immense cost of this building, as now asserted, with honest judgment and estimate by the architect who made the estimate for the committee two years ago.

If these things be so, I think their connection with the building should cease.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee appointed to make investigation in regard to the new Library has taken a considerable amount of testimony, and would have been able to submit its report to the House at this time but for the absence of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, whose testimony was deemed desirable. His testimony I hope will be procured in a few days, and then I presume the committee will be prepared to submit its report. The facts, however, which in a general way are within the knowledge of members of the House and Senate, are the facts which have been substantially developed. It is true, as the gentleman from Illinois has said, the House entered upon this enterprise supposing the building was to cost about $3,000,000. Indeed, the different sums making up that amount are distinctly stated in the report made to the Forty-ninth Congress, a former report to the same effect having been made to the Forty-eighth Congress, both reports to the same effect. The first appropriation for the building was to be $500,000; the second, $1,000,000; the third, $800,000; and these sums were to complete the building ready for occupation; and $700,000 would be required, at the rate of about $14,000 a year, during a long period of years, to complete the alcoves for books, the shelving, etc., making the entire expenditure about $3,000,000.

A MEMBER. For the west wing?

Mr. HOLMAN. For the entire structure. A suggestion was made on the floor of the House when the subject was under debate——

A MEMBER. Was the estimate just mentioned by the gentleman given by the architect?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will come to that later. A suggestion was made that that estimate was based upon what is now known as the reduced plan, "Plan No. 1;" but that clearly was a mistake. At least your commission did not so interpret the law, but instantly entered upon the contracts for the excavation for the entire building, contemplating a structure much larger than the great edifice known as the State, War, and Navy Department building, which cost over $10,000,000. So that the impression upon the minds of some gentlemen that the House was not deceived in this matter is clearly a mistake; the House was assured in the most unequivocal terms by one of the most honorable gentlemen then or ever on this floor, chairman of the Library Committee, that the entire cost of this structure—not according to Plan No. 1, which contemplated a partial building, but the entire structure upon the basis of which contracts were entered into at once—would be $500,000 in the first instance, $1,000,000 next year, $800,000 the next year, with finally $700,000, when the entire great structure was completed.

Now, the contracts, so far as I am able to speak on that subject from the testimony taken, seem to have been reasonable enough, and so far they have been reasonably well fulfilled. The delay, which has been a subject of some complaint, but which has produced no injury to the Government, growing out of the controversies about cement, would require for full explanation too long a statement to justify making it, and one which would not be interesting or beneficial. Those contracts, however, are being fulfilled, and are being fulfilled upon the basis of this reduced structure.

Before going further let me correct one mistake of my friend in regard to the pair of horses and coupé. That statement is very nearly correct, but there was in fact only one horse and a coupé. When, however, the present Secretary of the Interior, a very practical business gentleman, became the head of that commission, the coupé and horse were promptly disposed of and the little money realized for their sale—of course the Government always buys dear and sells cheap—went into the Treasury. That put an end to coupé business.

Mr. PAYSON. And then they had to make another purchase of the same kind.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYSON. It appears from the report that fourteen hundred and some odd dollars were afterward spent in that way.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; that is the fact; but it is a trifling matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to do justice to these men; for resisting as I did for many years and to the last the entire scheme, believing at the time that the House was acting under a misapprehension, I do not feel any too kindly toward this project, and must therefore be careful for fear of doing injustice to these parties. But the horse and coupé were sold as soon as Mr. Secretary Vilas became a member of the commission—sold at a loss, of course; and that was the end of it.

But I think the only real question now is whether we shall stop right where we are or not. The Senate proposition is that in reducing the plan we shall permit the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the damages incurred by the contractors under the reduced two contracts—that is, for the foundation and for the terra-cotta pipe, which seems to be a separate matter—and that $1,000,000 shall be appropriated to go on with the work under Plan No. 1.

If you stop right now you will avoid the expenditure of the comparatively small sum of money remaining of the $500,000 appropriated. The whole sum of money appropriated up to this time is $1,085,000, $585,000 for the site and $500,000 for the structure. I suppose that the present contract carried out on Plan No. 1 will just about cover the amount of money already appropriated, and will not justify going further. The amount saved, therefore, would not be considerable, while the damages of entire suspension might be considerable to the contractor. It seems to me perhaps just as well, unless Congress is willing to abandon the enterprise, to let the plan go on as it is now until the present contract for the foundation upon the reduced plan is completed and the money already appropriated expended.

Mr. PAYSON. What does the gentleman mean by the "reduced plan?"

Mr. HOLMAN. The original plan covered the entire structure; that was Plan No. 2, the plan which was laid before the House and on which the House voted.

Mr. TAULBEE. And on which the estimates were given.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, on which the estimates were given. The reduced plan was suggested by the present Secretary of the Interior. He saw that the scheme was more gigantic and expensive than perhaps was contemplated by Congress and promptly reduced the plan to what is known as Plan No. 1. Even that will cost at least $4,000,000, I think much more.

Mr. PAYSON. Is there any "perhaps" about that? The gentleman speaks very guardedly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The present Secretary of the Interior as soon as he looked into the matter, and acting apparently within the scope of the law, suggested the reduction of the plan so as to construct only the west-front portion of the building and the rotunda or reading-room, which, as I remarked, will cover about one-third of the ground. This reduction of the plan would save about one-half of the whole expenditure of construction.

Mr. PAYSON. In order to see whether I am accurate, I wish to ask the gentleman whether "Plan No. 2," to which the gentleman has referred, is not a substantial portion of the original general plan.

Mr. HOLMAN. Plan No. 2 was the original plan, the entire structure. Plan No. 1 is the reduced plan, and is a part of the original Plan No. 2.

Mr. PAYSON. Then why does not that leave the Government committed to the building of this entire structure under the "gigantic scheme" of which the gentleman has spoken?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true. The reduced plan is a part of the original scheme. Just one word upon that subject, for it has been somewhat considered.

Mr. PAYSON. Where?

Mr. HOLMAN. By the committee of the House to which reference has been made. At least they have examined the subject as carefully as they could. The statement made by the Secretary of the Interior before that committee is very full and very much in detail and very practical, and I hope that before this matter comes up again it will be laid before the House. It seems to me that the views he has expressed are entitled to great consideration now that Congress has already invested a million dollars in this enterprise.

In this great excavation which has been made there is, of course, an immense space which will not be covered by that building. To construct a building upon Plan No. 1, including the rotunda or reading room, ample for the present and for twenty-five years to come——

Mr. RYAN. Probably fifty.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps fifty years to come will cost $4,000,000 or more. If this partial construction of the building be made, the banks of this excavation being graded down as suggested by the Secretary and also by the Superintendent, a gentleman of intelligence, who was appointed after Secretary Vilas became Secretary of the Interior—if the banks be sloped down with a grassy surface and the ground planted with shrubbery as that in front of the Treasury building, the structure might look well enough—will not be an unseemly affair. Such a plan will, however, keep everlastingly before Congress the suggestion of a vast expenditure to complete the building. That is one of the troubles in a matter of this kind. Of course such a suggestion is always aggressive. But for the present nothing ought to be done, at least in the way of new appropriations.

Mr. RYAN. Would that be the case if the law were repealed?

Mr. HOLMAN. It would not. If the law is repealed you can commence any plan desirable and limit the cost.

Mr. RYAN. Permit me to say that I do not think the idea entered into the mind of any conferee to agree to the Senate amendment without a repeal of the original law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not know that the Committee on Appropriations or the committee of conference had reached that conclusion.

Mr. RYAN. I wish to say, and I think I can safely say, that no conclusion will be reached favorable to the Senate amendments without an additional amendment of that kind.

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman will yield for a question——

Mr. HOLMAN. That would not be an amendment to the Senate amendment, but an amendment to the House proposition.

Mr. RYAN. The Senate amendment of course leaves the whole subject open, and upon that we have the parliamentary right to provide for the repeal of the original law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And pay damages.

Mr. RYAN. Hence I say——

Mr. HOLMAN. The Senate amendment provides for damages.

Mr. RYAN. I do not think it has entered into the minds of any of the conferees on the part of the House to consent to the Senate amendment, except with such additional amendment as I have indicated repealing the law.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman will allow me for one moment. Here is the position we occupy in reference to this building. We have contracted to erect a portion of that building.

Mr. FARQUHAR. One-third of it.

Mr. PAYSON. And the entire structure when completed was not only going to astonish everybody who came here from abroad, but stir the patriotism of every citizen who came to look at it. We propose to take a fractional portion of the general plan of the building and then repeal the law providing for the balance. What will be the result? The result will be that you will have an architectural abortion. Everybody knows that as well as they can know anything. If we are to do away with the original plan we had better rub it all out and commence over again. If we are the victims, as we claim we are, instead of providing for a fractional part of the plan for the Library of Congress, let us repeal the law. Instead of putting up a part of the building and providing for the balance, as the gentleman from Indiana has suggested, by planting some shrubbery to hide it from the people, and with a wall on the other side so that also may be concealed from view, let us repeal the whole law and commence over again.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] that I would gladly see the whole scheme abandoned, but the reduced building which is proposed would not be an architectural abortion in the opinion of architects and those who understand such matters and are necessarily more familiar with them than most of us are. That partial building with a sloping down of the banks, it is said, would be a very respectable structure. I know nothing about architecture. That is the idea of men who understand this matter as architects, much better than most of us do here.

I wish to add a word, and will then yield the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is a member of the committee to inquire into the Library building.

The one question is whether you will save by this proposition to expend the balance appropriated on the foundation for the reduced plan. The amount under the control of the commission is not large. It is the balance of the $500,000 already appropriated. Under the House proposition suspending the work and inviting new plans you will have Plan No. 1, which is now in progress, and Plan No. 2, the original plan which was before us when the House voted for the bill, and then we will have beside very valuable matter, that is, full information on the whole subject. As to the balance of the $500,000——

Mr. PAYSON. That was used in putting in the foundations.

Mr. MAISH. I wish to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAISH. The question has already been asked, but the gentleman has not answered it. It is in reference to Mr. Smithmeyer, the honorable and worthy architect, a gentleman of high reputation. I want to ask if it is true, as a matter of fact, as was alleged by the gentleman from Illinois, that Mr. Smithmeyer, the architect, submitted an estimate that the entire structure would cost only $2,500,000? I think that was the amount stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ought to answer that question, and yet do not wish to do so without the testimony before me, and yet the testimony upon that point is neither satisfactory nor complete. Mr. Smithmeyer states emphatically, states under oath, that he made no definite estimate. There is a paper which he submitted, perhaps to the Senate committee, which had the matter in charge for a long time, for it was, as gentlemen know, a Senate measure, in which there was at least a partial estimate; but I am not able to state, either on the authority of General Singleton or any other person, Mr. Smithmeyer knew the terms of General Singleton's report or was cognizant of the preparation of the report, or that he made specific estimates of the cost of the building. The matter is singularly obscure.

Mr. KELLEY. I have always understood exactly to the contrary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have of course no personal knowledge on the subject, but I understand that this gentleman is a competent architect.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to read an extract from the report of General Singleton's committee?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. Coupling it with the statement that this is a report on a bill providing additional accommodations for the Library; and it will be remembered that Mr. Smithmeyer was on the committee and was in constant communication with the members of the House engaged in that service.

Mr. STEELE. Was a member of what committee?

Mr. PAYSON. A commission which was appointed to look into the question of the enlargement of the Capitol for this purpose; and he was in daily communication with the members of the House who were charged with the work during several Congresses while they were engaged in that duty.

This report goes on to state:

The proposed building, as stated, will contain 3,000,000 volumes, with suitable economy of storage. It is not designed to fit up the whole interior at once with iron shelving, but to introduce it gradually, finishing off the central portions, rotunda, and connecting rooms, and the entire exterior structure. The chief element of cost is in the iron alcoves of the interior; and in a building so extensive these may be finished in successive years as wanted for the increase of books. The most carefully guarded estimates of cost contemplate an expenditure of only $500,000 the first year, about $1,000,000 the second, and $800,000 the third, which will complete the building for occupancy in all its parts sufficient for shelving 1,000,000 books and leaving space for the gradual introduction of additional iron alcoves in the coming fifty years, the ultimate gross cost of which will not exceed $700,000, or an average of less than $14,000 a year. When it is considered that the copyright fees paid into the Treasury amount to over $20,000 a year, while the pecuniary value of copyright publications received annually is very much greater than this, the expenditure will appear moderate in comparison with the great resulting benefits and the national importance of the work.

That makes the total cost of the building, with the exception of the additional shelving required, about $2,323,000.

Mr. STEELE. But Mr. Smithmeyer did not make any such report as that.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And it was not a report on Plan No. 2 either.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no question that some one estimated the cost of the whole structure at $3,000,000. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL].

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may have a few moments' serious thought upon the subject which is now before the House, I will state what information I have been able to gain in connection with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in this investigation. I have no object whatever in the statements I shall make except to inform the House of the exact condition of the question.

We all remember that this question of building a public Library has agitated Congress for many years, and time after time we have rejected propositions that were submitted, because they involved an expenditure of too much money. Even $4,000,000 proposed as the cost was rejected years ago, and within my own recollection, because it was deemed excessive.

Two years ago we passed this law authorizing the construction of a building according to a plan submitted, that would cost $2,300,000, within the next three years, and ultimately $700,000 more money would be needed for additional work within the building, making a total cost of three millions. It was because of that low estimate that the House passed the bill at all. Unquestionably when we did enact that law it was with the understanding that this entire structure would cost but $3,000,000 when completed. It was to be 463 feet and 8 inches long by 332½ feet wide. The construction was begun by the excavation for the entire site. It seemed the commission understood that we were to erect the whole building at a cost of $2,300,000 within the three years and ultimately $700,000 additional in order to make it complete for the purpose intended. As I have said, they commenced the excavation for the whole site of the building, and prepared a foundation for the entire structure. The investigation discloses that this building, if completed, will cost at least $10,000,000, and we have felt it to be our duty to so advise the House.

The number of square feet in the building entire will be 111,000, while the State, War, and Navy Department building, which has grown up within our own recollections, embraces only 93,000 feet. Congress never contemplated the erection of a building far in excess of the War and Navy Department building, and we all understand that. We were greatly deceived, perhaps by our own carelessness and negligence by not investigating the plans further; but certain it is that it was never understood that the extent and cost of the building, according to the plans which were laid before the House by this architect, would even approximate these figures.

I want to say here, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a man on the floor of this House that will approve of the manner in which the building has been carried on for the first year. I concede with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that there are many fine tables and fine plans that can be found in the office of the architect; but when I tell him that if he looks at the report and sees that the entire expenditure for this service involved an outlay of some $97,000, he will understand why these "fine things" may be found there. I do not believe that any gentleman would indorse the extravagant manner in which the business has proceeded, and, I repeat, we felt it to be our duty to inform the House of the way in which the work was being continued.

I will say further that since the present Secretary of the Interior has had control of the building, had it under his own charge, an entirely different principle has been inaugurated. I have great confidence in his ability to conduct the building of this Library in a safer and more economic way than ever before.

Expenditures that we can not approve, that were simply outrageous, for supernumeraries that were added in large numbers about the erection of that building; and I want to say to you gentlemen that if this architect is responsible for these supernumeraries and these extravagant expenditures he is not the proper man to conduct the erection of such a building.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is the commission that ought to be held responsible.

Mr. KELLEY. He did not employ them.

Mr. FARQUHAR. He had not authority to appoint any one, and he did not.

Mr. CASWELL. And yet he had almost the entire control of the erection of the building. As a matter of fact these commissioners were otherwise employed, and could not give their personal attention to this matter. If there is any man here on this floor who wants to champion the management of this architect and the conduct of that building, I have many things I could say to him which I do not now propose to do, but which would not sound very well.

Mr. PAYSON. Why should you not state them now?

Mr. CASWELL. I have not time.

Mr. PAYSON. There is plenty of time.

Mr. CASWELL. Can you tell me why it was necessary to buy a coupé at a cost of $611? And if it was necessary, why was it necessary when the present Secretary of the Interior discovered it that he should order it sold at an expense of $225? Can any man tell me why he persisted in the purchase of a cement which caused a delay all along through the winter months at a cost of nearly $3 a barrel from foreign manufacturers, when it could be bought of our own manufacturers for about a dollar, and which was said by experts before this committee to be just as good. Can any man tell me why it was necessary for him to keep seven watchmen to guard that fence and hole which he had excavated in the ground? [Laughter.] Can you tell me why he needed five messengers on duty constantly?

Mr. PERKINS. To watch the guards.

Mr. CASWELL. To watch the guards, as has been suggested. No gentleman, as I stated on this floor, would approve this amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CASWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If these appointments were made, were they not made because of persistent urging by members of Congress?

Mr. CASWELL. I do not know how they were appointed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That might be.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] one question, and that is: Could he have employed one man even as a watchman or otherwise without the consent of this commission?

Mr. CASWELL. I have no doubt they did consent to it, but I have no further doubt they approved whatever he recommended.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then let the blame go where it belongs.

Mr. CASWELL. They supposed they had a man on whom they could depend.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is supposition.

Mr. CASWELL. I am not here with a view to bring any censure upon him. I care nothing about him. He has very excellent qualities and may have some skill; but I was simply speaking as to his administration; and you may pass your judgment as you please. I have said there were a number of supernumeraries; and I will mention one. They had an accountant at a salary of $2,500 a year. I venture to say that he has not an hour's work for him that it will be necessary for him to do in a whole year. Now, it seems for the reasons I have assigned that there should be a better understanding of this matter. In the mean time let me say to this House that you had better pause before you appropriate any more money for the erection of that building and ascertain what is being done.

Our proposition is to go on with one wing of the building. You all know what that is. It is a building 463 feet 8 inches long and 112 feet wide. That will be the size of the structure when completed, and the probable cost will be $4,000,000, including the rotunda.

Now, it may be best to go on and put up that wing. If we are to look one hundred years ahead it is possible that we may construct the balance of the building; but, sir, I for one could not advise the idea of that further construction or that it would be wise to put up just simply that west wing of the building and let it stand there at a cost of $4,000,000. Perhaps it may be necessary to change the plans, and yet considering the work that we have entered upon it may be best to do it. But for one I am not prepared to do it at this session of Congress. I think we ought to look further into the subject before we appropriate more money. I will not say but at the next session of Congress it may be the best thing we can do; but if we do it we propose that this House shall do it understandingly and not grope along in the dark, as they have heretofore. That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire, Mr. Speaker, without having any present official connection with this subject, to say a few words upon it. It was my privilege to be a member of the Library Committee many, many years ago. I remember two of the works completed while I was on that committee. One was the enlargement of the accommodations for the Library by giving it two wings, each of equal dimensions, with the space then appropriated to it. Another was the construction of the conservatories for the advancement of botany and general science, connected with the Agricultural Department. I have always had a love for and interest in public libraries, and have for many years studied library architecture. I owe my first impulses toward education to the fact that when a young apprentice-boy I was invited to membership in the Youth's Library Company of Philadelphia, and found enjoyment and instruction in its rooms, with its books and its intelligent and aspiring members, who were boys of my own age, its debates, its reading of essays—puerile enough many of them doubtless were—but we were but young boys. I owe, I say, to that association and its influences whatever power I may have since enjoyed of serving my fellow-man, and that a library building, a library room, or the contents of a public library have always had a charm for me.

My attention was attracted to Mr. Smithmeyer years ago by the consideration of his plans for a Congressional Library, and I remember the delight with which I first saw and subsequently studied his plans for the magnificent gothic exterior in which he first proposed to incase the interior of the Library building. It stood there in front of the Clerk's desk through a whole session, and rivaled, according to my judgment, in beauty the finest gothic buildings I had seen on the other side of the Atlantic. I freely confess that I am an admirer of the genius of John L. Smithmeyer, and in a greater degree of the zeal with which he pursues, even now when he has passed possibly the prime of life, all the latest ideas of the highest authorities on architecture as the architectural publications in English, French, and German give them to the world. I speak whereof I know of this man, for his office has been a haunt for my leisure hours, and for eight years when I have been in Washington we have messed together. If I know any living man I know this abused and reviled architect, who, without pay from Congress, for fourteen years competed with the world in preparing a plan for a national Library building which should be worthy of the grandeur of his adopted country and would therefore immortalize his name.

Mr. CASWELL. I think the gentleman is mistaken on one point. I think there is an item of $1,500 paid to Mr. Smithmeyer for plans which were submitted but not adopted.

Mr. KELLEY. There was a competition at one time in which prizes of $1,500, $1,000, and $500, respectively, were offered for plans, and although the plan that Mr. Smithmeyer submitted may not then have been adopted it was approved beyond any other elicited by the general system of competition; and it seems that it is to his great discredit in the estimation of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] that his plan was so much better than the others that he got the $1,500 prize! Now, speaking commercially, I repeat that for fourteen years this patient man of genius has, under invitations extended by consecutive Congresses, competed with the architects of the world, those who submitted plans in the later competitions numbering as high as forty-one, and has not received any pay for that work.

And now he is made the victim of the fact that Congress established an impracticable executive for the construction of a library building, an executive for the expenditure of millions of dollars and the making of many contracts, consisting of three persons—a commission liable to constantly recurring changes in its personality, and by its terms to embrace as one of its members, by virtue of his office, an architect, as if it were intended to fix a probable source of jealousy and discord in the executive department at its very inception. To the Library Commission, consisting of the Secretary of the Interior, the Librarian of Congress, and the so-called Architect of the Capitol, was given all the executive power involved in the construction of the building.

Mr. Smithmeyer was named in the law only as the author of the plan which the commission were to follow; but, governed by common equity as well as by common sense, the commission, when it came to select an architect, naturally chose the man who had made the plans which had stood for fourteen years such competition, and which Congress had finally adopted and ordered to be carried into execution. This is Mr. Smithmeyer's position; he is an employé with no more right to contract for the services of a person than you, Mr. Chairman, or I, who are entirely unconnected with the commission, have. It is not fair, therefore, for Congress to saddle the responsibility upon a gentleman who is devoted to his profession, and who, with no political experience, is unfit to contend with such combinations among contractors and politicians as the expenditure by the United States Government of two or three millions of dollars would inevitably effect.

I think, sir, that the Senate in its amendment has struck the point. I favor the Senate's amendment because I have always thought the Library Commission an utterly impractical executive, one that must ruin any architect it might employ. The Senate amendment proposes to remove this jarring, discordant, ever-changing commission, and to confide the work to the Chief Engineer of the Army. What evidence have we of the fitness of this engineer of the Army for the position? I will point you, sir, to two witnesses, either of which should be conclusive as to this man's genius and training in construction as an engineer. He extricated from doubt and confusion the construction and completion of the State, War, and Navy Department building, which, nearly as large as the national Library building will be when, a century or a century and a half hence, it may be completed and be ready to receive the growing history embodied in all the forms of literature and science that may be recorded by the graphic art.

That was a master-work of execution. The breath of scandal never touched the honored engineer of our Army who superintended its construction; and it will never reach him if the two Houses of Congress shall wisely adopt the plan proposed by the Senate to get rid of an impracticable commission and put the work of constructing the Library building, under limitations adapted to the present necessities of the country, in the hands of a man who put new foundations under the completed Washington Monument. With stone-work 555 feet in height the Army engineer to whom the Senate proposes to confide the Library building made that structure safe for all time to come by re-enforcing its foundations, a work of engineering not equaled in the history of man. This is the officer to whom the Senate proposes to confide the erection of this Library building.

It is said that to put up the west front and the rotunda will present an unseemly structure—an architectural abortion. That rotunda is by the plan larger, much larger, than the reading-room or rotunda of the British Museum, the most wonderful institution of its kind in the world. It is to be 4 feet greater in diameter than the space under the Dome of this Capitol.

When, more than thirty-six years ago, I first visited the British Museum, it presented, as our Library building will do, one front, with the reading-room or dome in the rear. I have visited it often in the interim and have marked from time to time the growth of the majestic building which now embodies so much of the history of the past in its jewel cases, its coin cases, and its ruins brought from all classic lands and all the earlier homes of civilization. Rapidly as these have accumulated, it has grown to be able to accommodate them all. So our Library ought to have depositories for these small articles—gems cut in various eras of the past, and ancient coins that our naval officers and travelers will gather from every land and bring to us, as English patriotism has impelled Englishmen to bring these contributions to the British Museum.

Let us proceed to complete the work we have so well begun. I do not believe that the Congress which passed the law for the erection of this library was either besotted or negligent. I believe that it acted well and wisely. I believe that the action of the architect and the whole records of his office and of the commission will prove this.

But it has been asked, why so many officers? I reply, why so many commissioners to be bored for appointments and contracts by politicians and personal friends? Again it is asked, why has that vast excavation been made and the stone work for the foundation been contracted for? And again I reply, why so many commissioners to be solicited by so many members of Congress and other politicians for contracts and appointments? Do not make a scapegoat of this scholarly man who has had no power to make contracts or bestow appointments. He has honored our country by proposing to give it what the architects of the wor'd, save, I think, one librarian who claims to know something of library architecture—a gentleman whose name is Poole, and who, I believe, resides in Chicago—say is the most perfect building for this purpose that has ever been planned by architectural genius, even when guided by the skill of a trained engineer; for engineering was Mr. Smithmeyer's profession before he devoted himself to his passion for architecture.

This gentleman having thus honored us, we should not disgrace and degrade him, however much howling and ravenous contractors may strive to poison the Congressional mind against him. It is within my knowledge that he is pursued as by a band of hungry thieves, some of whom I know by fame; and knowing their fame I would in their presence put my hands in my pockets if there were coin in them. I know some of these men, and I know some of the members of the House into whose ears they have poured their insidious poison against this almost defenseless man who has thwarted their nefarious plans.

I say, therefore, send our conferees back for a free conference. There is evident doubt whether we would gain or lose by interrupting work on the building at this time. The Senate's proposition is to go on with one front and to thus afford accommodation which will bring into use our present library. This work is all to be done under an Army engineer whose skill and courage, and, above all, whose integrity and practical judgment are a guaranty against the wasteful expenditure of a dollar on any work of which he may have charge.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] who holds the floor to yield to me for three minutes, in order that I may reply to some suggestions which have just fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. CLEMENTS. I will yield to the gentleman for the time he has indicated.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says that this House has made a victim of this man Smithmeyer. I want to ask him wherein have we made him the victim? Has he not been well paid? If he has not been paid, let him present his bill, and let us compensate him.

Mr. KELLEY. One moment. There is something in character much more valuable than money.

Mr. CASWELL. The gentleman anticipates what I have to say; he does not wait until he hears what I have to say in reply to his suggestions.

Now, will the gentleman say that we have cast reflection on his architect or his plan for this building for the Library of Congress? Not in the least, for every one agrees it is a magnificent plan on a grand scale. No one has taken issue on that point.

I do not wish to detract from his ability as an architect in any respect whatever, but the simple question arises whether he has not made a victim of Congress on a grander scale than it is possible for us to make a victim of him. He stands by and wants that commission under the law to proceed to the construction of a building he had planned that would cost this Government at least $10,000,000, well knowing that we voted and passed the bill under the expectation and with the understanding that it would cost only $3,000,000. Gradually step by step he has allowed a course to be adopted, so perhaps we can not now retreat without loss.

I ask you, then, who has been made the victim? I concede it is a grand plan on a grand scale, and by the machinations and schemes of this architect the building has been prosecuted so that if carried out it will cost this Government $10,000,000, when Congress had utterly refused to go one dollar beyond $3,000,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Did the architect make an estimate it would only cost $3,000,000?

Mr. CASWELL. The gentleman from Indiana asks me whether he made an estimate on his plan. To whom do we look for estimates when we propose to erect public buildings except the architect?

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. What was his estimate?

Mr. CASWELL. He claims that he made no estimate whatever.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Then he is not to be held to blame.

Mr. CASWELL. But he knew the report was submitted to Congress that when Congress passed the law the building would not cost more than $3,000,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. It was the duty of Congress to make that inquiry in the beginning.

Mr. CASWELL. They relied on him not to allow the cost to exceed the $3,000,000, which was the limit beyond which Congress refused to go. In the testimony a witness on the stand, in answer to that very question, understood Mr. Smithmeyer to say to one of the commissioners it would cost only $3,000,000, but he was not positive as to that. He knew Congress did not propose to put up a building costing a greater sum than that, and yet permitted it to go on, knowing the cost would be some $10,000,000. If there has been any victim at all, it certainly is not Mr. Smithmeyer.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Who made the estimate if the architect did not?

Mr. CASWELL. There was the report of the Committee on the Library, submitted by Mr. Singleton, of Mississippi, that there was to be expended on the building in the next few years $2,300,000, and then $700,000, which was to finish the building. He had that information as to what was the intention of Congress when they passed the law. The chairman of the committee was not expected to make the estimate. He was not competent for that work. The commission was not competent for that work. They relied upon the architect himself, but, as I have said, he stood by and allowed a building to be put up to cost $10,000,000 instead of $3,000,000, which was the limit of Congress when the law was passed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLEMENTS. I will now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say only a single word, not with reference to what has been said by the gentleman who has just concluded his remarks, or to take issue with him or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] upon the points suggested, for I know nothing of the conduct of this matter.

Mr. CASWELL. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for one moment?

Mr. HOOKER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CASWELL. I only want to add a word further to what I have said. The question comes down to this: The proposition by the Senate is to go on with the building 463 feet in length by 112 in width, more than four times the length of its width. Now, is it good policy for us to construct a building which when completed at a cost of about $4,000,000 will be in that shape, nearly in the shape of this paper which I hold in my hand? I ask if that would be good architecture, or good policy for Congress to adopt? I think not.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and others, who say that what was done by this House at a former Congress in the way of making the appropriation in question seems to have been done inconsiderately and without proper information. I wish to show in opposition to that statement and on the contrary, as appears from the report and the debate on that question, that the subject-matter—and I say this more for the purpose of vindicating my friend, General Singleton, who is not now but was formerly a member of this House and chairman of the Committee on the Library, not that anything has been said in derogation of him, for I well understand that gentlemen do not mean any reflection upon him, but simply to show that the matter was placed by him before the House, and that the House acted calmly and deliberately and after a full presentation of the whole facts of the case by him. A controversy has now grown up with regard to the expenditures for this work.

Everybody concedes, and it has been undisputed for years, that something must be done to increase the accommodations of the Congressional Library. It was the idea of some gentlemen to make additions to the building at present used, extending it east and west or in both directions as was found available, in order to provide an additional space for the increased number of the volumes of our Library which are accumulating so rapidly and for which there is no room for their storage or even their safe-keeping in the present building. I repeat, that was the idea with some, and a controversy grew up as to whether that old Library building could be extended to accomodate the vast accumulation of books, so largely now in excess of the capacity of the building as to leave scarce room to walk in it, or whether we should construct a new and separate building. When that matter was under consideration in the House, Mr. Singleton made a report on March 23, 1886, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the entire bill and report of Mr. Singleton were read and published in the RECORD which is now before me, and that bill was fully considered. At a subsequent time, after the members had had ample opportunity to read the bill and the report and study it, Mr. Singleton, in a very elaborate speech upon the question, which my friend from Indiana, Judge HOLMAN, complimented most highly at the time and commended in the most favorable terms when giving the reasons which animated the committee to report in favor of a separate building, used this language, giving his reasons seriatim:

Sixthly. If economy is to be our watchword, a separate building must be erected. Any extension of the Capitol heretofore proposed, affording adequate accommodations for the Library, even for twenty years, would involve an expenditure, according to the opinion of Mr. Walter, the former Architect of the Capitol, of $1,500,000, and according to the present Architect, Edward Clark, of $4,200,000, while the estimate for the building proposed by the committee, made by J. L. Smithmeyer, who drew the plan, will cost $2,323,600, making a difference in favor of the Government, according to Walter's estimate, of $2,176,400, or a saving of nearly one-half, and according to Clark's estimate a difference of $1,876,400.

Further along in the same speech Mr. Singleton used this language:

The appropriations asked for—

Showing what the bill contemplated, and that the amount proposed in the bill was for the erection of a building and was entirely outside and independent of the $600,000 appropriated for the purchase of the site—

The appropriations asked for will be $500,000 to begin the work, $1,000,000 at the next session to continue it, and $823,600 at the succeeding session to complete it. This, of course, does not embrace the purchase of the site. It is confidently believed that these sums will finish the building so far as needed at present and for many years to come; and no further outlay need be made by the Government, utilizing, as before stated, the fees from the copyright system to put in shelving, etc., to meet the growing wants of the Library.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Singleton's plan did not propose the entire completion of the building, but only a fragment of it, and $700,000 was to be appropriated for additional shelving and for the construction of the alcoves to contain the volumes to be accommodated. This House understood, distinctly understood at the time, that in constructing a great edifice like this it was not natural to suppose that there was a Senate committee which would be able, or even the architect himself who would be able, to estimate the exact cost of the entire building. But this was not a proposition to erect the entire structure for this appropriation, but was a provision, according to Plan No. 1, to finish such portion of the edifice as was needed at that expense, and of course contemplating subsequent increase as the volumes accumulated. In other words, that the building could be added to from time to time as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said was done in the construction of that magnificent edifice the British Museum. The House therefore could not have been misled or could not have acted unadvisedly and in the dark, but evidently had full information on the subject.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me a single moment to correct the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman from Mississippi will read other portions of the report of General Singleton he will find the figures he gave contemplated the erection of the entire structure and its completion, with the exception of the alcoves or iron shelving. That $700,000 was simply to put in furniture as it should be needed. The structure itself was to cost $2,300,000.

Mr. HOOKER. The exterior of the structure.

Mr. CASWELL. It would cost $8,000,000 to erect the exterior structure.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I have nothing to say in the way of criticism or antagonism to the very splendid eulogy delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] upon his friend, Mr. Smithmeyer; nor have I anything to say in contradiction of what he has said of the importance of a National Library and great libraries in general for the education of the people. I suppose there is no member on this floor that does not see the importance of our Library and the necessity for making early provision for its proper preservation and use; nor do I believe there is anybody in this House at this time who antagonizes the proposition to erect a Library building separate from the Capitol.

I am not here to criticise Mr. Smithmeyer, for the reason that I do not know the source of information upon which the Committee on the Library of the last Congress acted in making their report to this House, upon which the House acted.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Singleton, in the remarks that have just been read, stated that they were made by Mr. Smithmeyer himself.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. The reading of that part of Mr. Singleton's speech escaped my attention. But we are confronted with a state of things with which it is our duty to deal; and it is due to ourselves as well as to the country that we should in a business-like way dispose of this question to the best interest of the Library and of the country.

Now, the proposition under discussion is, first, the clause in the bill as proposed by the House, which substantially is to suspend the work on the Library building until the next session of this Congress, and in the mean time ask for plans from eminent architects throughout the country, for which an appropriation is suggested of $10,000. This will give Congress time to consider these different plans and the merits of this whole matter as it now stands. It is only three months until the assembling of Congress again at the next session. Then we would have additional information and plans from which Congress could intelligently judge and make final decision.

The proposition of the Senate is substantially to appropriate a million dollars in pursuance of the plan already on our hands. It is true that it is said this is with a view of completing only one part of that plan; but there is nothing that dispenses with the balance of that plan. This is simply a quiet way of acquiescing in a plan that was imposed upon the last Congress, and by which it was said at that time would involve a cost of only $3,000,000 to finish ultimately. Now we are told that it will take at least $10,000,000. Is Congress ready to say that they will ratify this expenditure? I do not say who is responsible for it, for I am not informed as to the facts or as to the data on which the last Congress acted.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. What evidence have you now that it will cost $10,000,000?

Mr. CLEMENTS. That seems to be an accepted statement; and it is in accordance with the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, as stated on this floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. But there is no assurance that the building as now under contract could not be built for $5,000,000.

Mr. RYAN. The part proposed by the Senate, which is perhaps about one-half of the whole, it is estimated will cost not less than $4,000,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I have known buildings that were estimated to cost $400,000 that were built for $60,000.

Mr. CLEMENTS. It is very seldom that we hear of a building being completed for less than the estimate, especially public buildings as distinguished from private buildings.

It is the accepted opinion on both sides of the House that this building is to cost in the neighborhood of $10,000,000; which is also the belief expressed by the present Secretary of the Interior, as stated on the floor, under whose supervision this work is going on at this time; and it is to be taken for granted that that intelligent and responsible officer has given some practical business-like attention to this question. Now, is Congress ready to acquiesce in and approve what was done by the last Congress under a misrepresentation of the facts and make haste to say that we will not take three months to make further investigation for intelligent action, but will go under whip and spur and adopt legislation that will involve the Government in the expenditure of $10,000,000 instead of $3,000,000?

Now, if any gentleman can say that $10,000,000 is necessary and proper for the preservation and use of the Library, then I am ready to vote for it; but I think we ought to exercise some practical judgment in the interest of economy, and that we ought not to lose sight, notwithstanding the beautiful sentences of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] upon the buildings in the Old World and the magnificence of these plans devised for this structure, but occasionally to recur to the fact that we live in America, and that we once boasted of a little Jeffersonian simplicity.

A MEMBER. That is long ago.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes, but it would be well for us to recur to it occasionally, at least.

There is no necessity for us to copy after the extravagance of oppressive countries in the Old World in trying to cope with them in extravagant magnificence of structure and grandeur at the expense of the plain, tax-paying, honest citizens of the American Republic. Now, whatever is necessary ought to be voted promptly. Further than that we ought not to go. There is hardly any room for controversy over the fact that the last Congress was made to believe that $3,000,000 would not only complete the outward structure, but would put in all the shelving necessary for the next fifty years.

Mr. KELLEY. One moment. I meant to say, in the course of my previous remarks, but I believe I omitted it, that the last Congress was not stupid or flighty, and therefore it could not have believed that a building covering so many more square feet than the State, War, and Navy Department building covers, and which should be fitted up for library purposes, could be built for less than one-third of what the State, War, and Navy Department building cost. That building cost over ten millions, under the wisest supervision. The Government building in New York cost over nine millions. The Government building in my own State cost about four millions, and my city is building a municipal building the estimated cost of which upon the contract is over eleven millions. I do not want to see the Government of the United States, in erecting enduring buildings for its capital city, shrink behind the villages that are scattered over different parts of the country.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Neither do I want to see this Congress vote one dollar of money less than is necessary for a reasonable and adequate building for the accommodation of the Library and for its proper preservation and use. But we owe it to the people to see that their money is expended economically, fairly, and honestly. We owe it to ourselves that whatever plan we adopt we shall adopt it understandingly, openly, and without deception, knowing and making known so far as we can at the beginning what the building is to cost.

This Congress owes it to itself to call a halt and to ascertain definitely what is necessary, and then to march up promptly and vote what is necessary. But to be asked to vote now in ratification of what must be conceded to have been a misrepresentation is not dealing properly with this question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says that the last Congress was not stupefied or indifferent, and therefore could not have been ignorant of the fact that this building must cost a great deal more than the amount named in the report, and he cites by way of illustration other public buildings in New York and elsewhere which have cost more money, and also the State, War, and Navy Department building, which he says cost about ten millions or more.

I suppose, sir, that there were not many members of the House in the last Congress who took it upon themselves to investigate the details of the matter so as to ascertain exactly and definitely the number of square feet which the building would cover; but they were confronted here from day to day at this desk, while the Library bill was seeking consideration, with a design or plan of the building, showing what it was intended to be.

The plan was accompanied by the report of the Library Committee, which was headed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Singleton], than whom a more honest man never sat upon this floor, and in whose statements everybody had the utmost confidence, and from that report which accompanied the design members learn the estimated cost of the building. As I have said, I do not suppose there were many members who undertook to ascertain how much ground the building would cover, either absolutely or in comparison with other public buildings; but there was submitted to the House by that responsible committee an estimate of cost which was doubtless based upon the statement of some architect, and which, from the statements made here to-day, came most probably from Mr. Smithmeyer himself.

Mr. KELLEY. There was also a large lot of ground which the bill proposed to purchase or to condemn for the erection of the building. That ground was before the eyes of members of Congress, and certainly no man who had ever built even a stable could have supposed that a building which was to cover those two squares and the intermediate street could be built for $2,000,000.

Mr. CLEMENTS. It is not to be assumed that every building is to cover the entire area of the site on which it is to be put. According to the gentleman's own ideas of magnificence, there ought to be some room left for shade trees and lawns. It did not follow at all that this building was to cover the entire ground, nor is it at all likely that members went over the ground and measured its area and took that as a measure of what the building was to be. They had before them the report of a responsible committee who had investigated this whole matter, who had conferred with several architects, among them Mr. Smithmeyer, whose plan they selected, and the House accepted the statement which that committee made in their report as to the probable cost of the building, which statement, as it appears in two forms in the report, I now ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any enlargement of the Capitol which would accommodate the Library even as it stands, with room to arrange it, would cost much more than a separate building, because it must necessarily be constructed in the same costly style, with carved Corinthian architecture. Mr. Walter, the former Architect of the Capitol, estimated the cost of an extension of the west front at $4,500,000. The present Architect, Mr. Clark, estimates it to cost $4,200,000, while the plan of a building adopted by the committee is to cost only $2,323,600.

* * * * * * *

The proposed building, as stated, will contain 3,000,000 volumes with suitable economy of storage. It is not designed to fit up the whole interior at once with iron shelving, but to introduce it gradually, finishing off the central portions, rotunda, and connecting rooms, and the entire exterior structure. The chief element of cost is in the iron alcoves of the interior, and in a building so extensive these may be finished in successive years, as wanted for the increase of books.

The most carefully guarded estimates of cost contemplate an expenditure of only $500,000 the first year, about $1,000,000 the second, and $800,000 the third, which will complete the building for occupancy in all its parts sufficient for shelving 1,000,000 books and leaving space for the gradual introduction of additional iron alcoves in the coming fifty years, the ultimate gross cost of which will not exceed $700,000, or an average of less than $14,000 a year. When it is considered that the copyright fees paid into the Treasury amount to over $20,000 a year, while the pecuniary value of copyright publications received annually is very much greater than this, the expenditure will appear moderate in comparison with the great resulting benefits and the national importance of the work.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The truth is the Forty-ninth Congress voted upon the design of Mr. Smithmeyer for that building as presented in the House and as described in the report made at the time, and upon the estimates there set forth, the ultimate cost of which was to be $3,000,000, including all the interior work that would answer for the next fifty years. The House voted on that question under a suspension of the rules when debate was not allowed for more than thirty minutes, fifteen minutes on each side. Acting in that way the House accepted the estimates which had been presented to their committee and the statements of that committee as reliable. I submit that it is impossible from the record for gentlemen to contend here to-day that the House voted upon any other proposition, or that it ever voted upon the idea of an expenditure of $10,000,000.

In the report just read there is an argument against the extension of the Capitol building to accommodate the Library, a work which it was estimated at the time by the Architect of the Capitol would cost $4,200,000. The report of the committee, read to the House at that time, and upon which it acted, makes an argument against an extension of the Capitol for that purpose on the ground of expense, because a separate building would cost less, the cost of the extension of the Capitol being estimated, as I have said, at $4,200,000. The plan of a separate building was deemed preferable, because for the present an expenditure of $2,300,000 would be sufficient, and ultimately only $3,000,000 would be required. Is there any room for doubt as to the impression made upon the House at the time that bill was passed? Can there be any mistake as to what the understanding of Congress then was?

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me a single suggestion? The extract just read speaks of housing three million volumes. The library which it was then proposed to erect—the whole building—was with the view of affording space for nine to eleven million volumes.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The proposition was to erect a building which, when ultimately finished, would cost $3,000,000, and that an expenditure of $2,300,000 would provide ample room for three million books. The present Library contains far less than a million volumes—perhaps very little over half a million.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Smithmeyer goes to work and draws the working plans for the entire building from its foundation, including the excavation.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Certainly. I thank the gentleman for that suggestion. The commission followed up the idea of the act of Congress and what I claim was the expressed intention of that report. Mr. Smithmeyer drew the plan and superintended the work in pursuance of that plan under this commission, and excavated for the whole building.

Mr. HERBERT. And the very extract which has just been read refers directly to the completion of the exterior, and goes on to speak of the cost of the iron shelving inside. The estimate is for the completion of the whole exterior and enough of the iron shelving inside to accommodate 3,000,000 books, which it was estimated would be sufficient library accommodations for the next fifty years. That is what is asserted directly in the extract just read.

Mr. RYAN. I believe also that the contract for the concrete foundation was for the entire building.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, of course it was.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I thank the gentleman for these suggestions. All of these facts conspire to show that there was but one intent and that was to complete the building, whatever it was. Here was the plan, here was the description of it in the report, based upon statements and estimates, as now disclosed, of Mr. Smithmeyer.

Mr. PAYSON. Permit me an additional suggestion. The excavations have been entirely made, the foundations have been contracted for and very largely put in, and the working drawings and everything of that sort up to the present time have been made with one idea in view, the erection of the entire building as a whole. This was the idea down to the time the agitation began in this House at this session. And those plans were made under the direction of Mr. Smithmeyer himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to correct the gentleman. The plan was changed as soon as the present Secretary of the Interior came to consider the work.

Mr. PAYSON. But all the work done by Mr. Smithmeyer has been in contemplation of the entire structure.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. There is no question about that and never has been within my knowledge until this session of Congress.

Mr. KELLEY. The work may have been done under Mr. Smithmeyer's supervision, but he had no more power to contract for any work or insist upon its being done than had the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PAYSON. Of course not; but I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to remember that the point of contention is whether the House did what it did understandingly.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir; I understood the gentleman to be contending that Mr. Smithmeyer was responsible for this extension of the work according to the whole plan.

Mr. PAYSON. My friend does not seem yet to apprehend the point of contention.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, I do. You insist that while Mr. Smithmeyer proposed to put up a building which should be complete in itself and yet should constitute a part of a great building susceptible of enlargement so as to cover the whole ground purchased by the Government, he said the building would house 3,000,000 volumes and would cost only about $3,600,000. Mr. Smithmeyer never said that the building would cost $3,600,000, or any other precise sum.

Mr. PAYSON. But the chairman of the Library Committee, at that time Mr. Singleton, said that he said so. In a speech a copy of which I now hold in my hand Mr. Singleton stated that this estimate was made by Mr. Smithmeyer, the architect; and upon that statement the House voted. The same statement was made repeatedly in the Senate. And Mr. Smithmeyer was in the galleries and about these corridors; he visited members at their houses, as I happen to know, and he never disputed from that time until now what Mr. Singleton said he had stated. Mr. Singleton would go to anybody else for information; and the picture of the building, as designed by Mr. Smithmeyer, stood in this Hall for weeks in front of the Reporters' desk. The statements made at that time by General Singleton were never contradicted by anybody.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smithmeyer is an accomplished and experienced architect, and has built many prominent buildings in Washington and other parts of the country. Experience has taught him that it is impossible in a case of this kind to make a precise estimate; that a professional man should never stake his reputation on anything else than an approximate estimate; that by reason of changes in the cost of materials and rates of wages, and by reason also of the possibility of modifications in plans, no competent architect would undertake to make for a great building of this kind anything more than an approximate estimate.

Mr. PAYSON. Before the gentleman leaves that point——

Mr. KELLEY. Now, I say for the last time Mr. Smithmeyer was called upon to submit a whole plan for a great Library building for the future—called upon to submit a reduction of that plan so as to relieve the embarrassments of the Library for the present and to accommodate the accumulations by purchase and from the law of copyright for many years to come. He gave an estimate for the three-million-volume library. He never dreamed he was giving an estimate for an eleven-million-volume library.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that $2,323,000 is an approximate estimate for the construction of a building which is conceded after one year's delay the minimum cost of which will be $10,000,000?

Mr. KELLEY. He has never conceded that the part of the building which we propose to erect will require $10,000,000 or even $5,000,000.

Mr. PAYSON. But he has never denied that the whole building would cost $10,000,000.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I will now resume the floor. Mr. Speaker, the question I was discussing when the gentleman interrupted me—and I am always glad to yield to him—was, what information the House acted on in the Forty-ninth Congress, and what it was supposed would be the cost of that building which it authorized to be constructed. The gentleman says it could not have been the entire finishing of this building. I will read a few words more from the report, which is perhaps a repetition of what has been already stated:

The proposed building, as stated, will contain 3,000,000 volumes, with suitable economy of storage. It is not designed to fit up the whole interior at once with iron shelving, but to introduce it gradually, finishing off the central portions, rotunda, and connecting rooms and the entire exterior structure. The chief element of cost is in the iron alcoves of the interior, and in a building so extensive these may be finished in successive years, as wanted for the increase of books. The most carefully guarded estimates of cost contemplate an expenditure of only $500,000 for the first year, about $1,000,000 for the second, and $800,000 the third, which will complete the building for occupancy in all parts, sufficient for shelving one million books, and leaving space for the gradual introduction of additional iron alcoves in the coming fifty years, the ultimate gross cost of which will not exceed $700,000, or an average of less than $14,000 a year.

There is the information upon which this House acted and upon which Congress acted in the Forty-ninth Congress when it authorized the construction of this building, and, as will be seen by what I have read, it was the understanding that the cost of the building should not exceed $3,000,000.

Let me say the action of the commission and the conduct of the work under Mr. Smithmeyer up to this time, and the excavation for the entire building, all go to show there was but one intention on the part of Congress and those who have construed and executed the law, and that was it was to be an entire building.

Does the gentleman contend it is fair to the last Congress to say after the report which was submitted by the Committee on the Library, that this building was not to cost only $3,000,000, and that this architect was justified in proceeding to put up a building which would cost $10,000,000? If the information upon which we acted was reliable, then certainly there is no justification for exceeding the limit under the law. If it is admitted the information was unreliable, then, of course, we are all at sea.

If it turns out that the information upon which we acted was unreliable and that the work is going beyond what Congress and the country understood it would cost, then it should be stopped at once, and investigation should be had and another plan followed so that we may be able to say to the country what approximately the building will cost.

I do not say that it is necessary for us to follow the extravagant notions of the architect or act in accordance with the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], and put up a building to cope in splendor with all the world for the purpose of taking care of the books belonging to the Library of the American Republic.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. What was to be the material of the exterior of this building?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I have not before me any specification of what the material was to be.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Was it not to be of marble?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Marble, I think.

What are the facts? There had been an expenditure of $585,000 for the site, and then there was an appropriation of $500,000 to carry on the work. At the meeting of this Congress $200,000 of that amount had been expended, leaving a balance of money on hand for that purpose of $300,000.

Now, in conclusion, I will state again what the issue is, and I wish to repeat that the proposition on the part of the Committee on Appropriations as adopted by the House a few weeks ago, after a much fuller discussion of the question than took place when the bill was passed in the Forty-ninth Congress, was to suspend the work, to investigate, and invite plans from eminent architects throughout the country, for which $10,000 was appropriated, and leave the matter open until the beginning of the next session of Congress, only about three months off; and then, with full information of the facts before us, we can adopt that plan which will not only be an honor to Congress, but which will meet the views of the American people as to what is right and necessary in this connection. There is not much delay about it.

There is no proposition to abandon the idea of a commodious library. It is simply asking that we stop now, in view of facts that have been elicited, in view of the fact that we have been most egregiously deceived—at least the last Congress was—and inform ourselves of the true state of the matter, and then start out anew in the right direction.

Mr. FELTON. That is right.

Mr. CANNON. I wish the gentleman would yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to move the previous question unless we can come to some understanding to limit this debate.

Mr. JACKSON. Has the gentleman the time to yield?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia had an hour, which he yielded to his colleague.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what the merits or demerits of Mr. Smithmeyer may be or may have been. I know one thing, that I am willing to vote a liberal appropriation for the erection of a public library building; and after listening to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL], and having given attention to the matter and heard various suggestions in regard to it, I am willing, in view of the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior, that this building, in his opinion, as I understand it, should be finished according to Plan No. 1, at an expense not exceeding $4,000,000. I am willing to go on and finish it. It is no objection to me that it can be added to fifty years from now when we may need such addition and we can spend more money upon it, or one hundred years from now, as the demand for increased space arises.

I must confess that I heartily approve the clause of the Senate amendment which places the construction of the building under the charge of the Chief of Engineers, General Casey. He has proven himself and his capacity in the State, War, and Navy Department building, and where an eminent architect failed, Mr. Mullett—at least the plan was severely criticised, and the construction of the south wing also. The north and west wings were successfully and economically constructed under the direction of General Casey at a cost of a very large sum less than it was supposed would be required according to the cost of the south wing.

I am willing in this case to let the conferees go back to the Senate with such expressions of opinion as they have heard here, and with such knowledge as they may have obtained from the views of members on the floor added to the knowledge they had. I would be glad if they would bring in a report of an agreement to repeal the act which does more than authorize the construction of the building according to the Plan No. 1 for a Library of Congress, and according to the views of gentlemen who are familiar with the subject such a plan would be ample for forty or fifty years at least. I think now that we have just as much time to dispose of it as we will have at the short session next winter. Of course I have no defense to make for individual misunderstandings, including my own. I guess I ought to have known more about it, but I did not. We appear, however, to have struck upon a plan where it does seem reasonable to expect that we can get a building inside of $4,000,000 which will answer the necessary purposes for fifty years, and may then be added to if needed.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the previous question on the motion to insist on the disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. Will it be in order to move an amendment to the motion to insist?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be if the previous question is not ordered.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to offer this amendment before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. FORNEY. I have no objection to the gentleman offering it with the understanding that the previous question is then to be moved.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not want to debate it. I ask the adoption of this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the conferees on the part of the House, on Senate amendment No. 110, be instructed to adhere to the House provision in the bill, relating to the building for a Library of Congress.

Mr. FORNEY. Well, that is my motion.

Mr. PAYSON. Not exactly.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know if the demand for the previous question embraces all of these amendments, or if it is only on the pending proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only on the pending question.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a parliamentary question. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois it is that the House instructs the conference committee to adhere to the provision of the House bill?

Mr. PAYSON. That is it precisely.

Mr. RYAN. The effect, of course, if that prevails, will be to leave the conference committee tied up on this question.

Mr. PAYSON. That is it, sir; and I think it ought to be done. It does not leave any leeway to accept a proposition from the Senate in the line of the Senate proposition.

Mr. RYAN. The effect of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], standing alone, would be to let the House conferees go back for a free conference, after further instructions, on the Senate amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. I amend the Senate amendment with my proposition.

Mr. RYAN. But your proposition prevents them giving the Senate amendment any further consideration whatever.

Mr. PAYSON. Precisely; and the House stands by the House proposition.

Mr. FORNEY. I demand the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. This amendment, as I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], does allow the conferees of the House to go back and confer with the conferees on the part of the Senate in this matter.

The previous question was ordered on the amendment.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I think the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] contains more than that. Going back of it is the repealing feature of the old House proposition, and throwing aside all matters of detail in conference. I do not wish to discuss the matter.

Mr. FORNEY. You can vote it down.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Certainly; it can be voted down.

Mr. CANNON. Let it be reported again.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Can not the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama be reported again?

The proposition of Mr. FORNEY and the amendment offered by Mr. PAYSON were again reported.

Mr. CANNON. This is the last parliamentary step which can be taken.

Mr. KELLEY. And it is premature at this stage.

Mr. CANNON. I never knew of that motion being made at this stage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. KELLEY. It may be in order, but it is premature.

Mr. CANNON. I did not say that it was not in order. I said that it was unusual.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not control that.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. PAYSON, and there were—ayes 12, noes 46.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the ayes are 12, the noes are 46. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], that the House insists upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agrees to the conference asked for.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, line 8, after the word "office," insert "and the Bureau of Education."

Mr. COBB. Is this the section about the removal?

Mr. FORNEY. It is.

Mr. BURNES. I make the motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment just reported.

Mr. CANNON. What is the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To exempt the Bureau of Education from removal to the Pension building as proposed by existing legislation.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that it will not be receded from.

Mr. BURNES. I make the motion in order to bring the question properly before the House; and I also desire to say that I am in favor of it. The Secretary of the Interior advises us that at this particular time it would result in great inconvenience, and as his judgment has always been sound in these matters, I am in favor of receding.

Mr. CANNON. I only want to say a word about it. Legislation was had in the last Congress which provided that there should be placed in the Pension Office the Commissioner of Railroads and his office; the Commissioner of Education with his office, and the General Land Office with all the records and the clerks. The gentleman from——

Mr. BURNES. And the pension agent.

Mr. CANNON. And the pension agent besides. The gentleman who has led this House in connection with this legislation so far as it was concerned, now upon his sick-bed [Mr. RANDALL], I know gave to this whole question pertaining to that building a very thorough and exhaustive consideration along with the subcommittee——

Mr. BURNES. I would remind my colleague that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] did not investigate this matter as thoroughly as the Secretary of the Interior, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], and myself. We went through the Pension building and Bureau of Education, and the Secretary of the Interior was with us. We made a careful examination, and while we thought at the time, and while I still think, there is room enough for all these offices, yet the Commissioner of Pensions is very much opposed to it. He says it is taking room that he needs. The Secretary of the Interior is opposed to it, and asks us to recede, believing it will cause a great deal of confusion; and he asks that for the present year, at least, we should not place the Bureau of Education in that building. In view of this request I think we ought not to move that bureau.

Mr. CANNON. Now, my friend cut me off in the middle of a sentence, and I will have to go back and pick it up. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and his subcommittee gave this matter a very thorough and exhaustive examination last year. The proposition went to the Senate, and the Senate almost refused to consider it. They said it was a matter of administration. After considerable effort, as I am informed, the Senate subcommittee, Mr. ALLISON and Mr. HALE and, I believe, Mr. COCKRELL, went in person in connection with General Meigs, as I understand it, to the Pension building and gave a thorough examination of the room in that building. When they came to a second conference they said, "You are right; there is plenty of room in that magnificent building," not only for the Commissioner of Education with his small office, not only for the Commissioner of Railroads and his small office, but for the Land Office and all the clerks and all the records. And they wrote it in the shape of an absolute mandatory law that on or before the 1st day of next December all those offices should be removed into that building.

Now the Land Office has dropped out; it is not to go. The law is modified in that respect. The pension agent has been dropped out; he is not to go. The law is modified in that respect. And now it is proposed to further modify the law so as to let the Commissioner of Education, with his small clerical force, continue to pay $6,000 a year rent in his present location. They say that he has important books and materials for which he requires storage room.

There is plenty of space for storage in the upper rooms, which are not occupied for anything else, and, so far as his clerical force is concerned, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was clearly of the opinion, and I am of the opinion myself from what little examination I have been able to give to the matter, that there is not only room for that clerical force, but for a very much larger one. I think the House ought to understand this matter. The law, even after it has been modified as I have stated, provides that the Commissioner of Education shall go there, and I think he ought to go.

With all due respect to the Commissioner of Pensions and to the Secretary of the Interior and all these executive officers—and I am not going to abuse or blame any of them—with all due respect to them I say that I have never yet found an executive officer in Washington who was willing to yield up room when he once got control of it. In the Forty-seventh Congress, when I had charge of the legislative bill, the Committee on Appropriations made a contest in which we had several conferences with the Senate. The proposition was that we would take out of some nine different buildings—fire-traps—in different parts of this city, and condemned buildings at that, the official records of the war and place them in the south and east wings of the State, War, and Navy Department building.

They told us there they had not room. We went through that magnificent south wing of the building, containing, as nearly as I recollect, 100,000 square feet of office space, and there were fifty-one people employed there—they appeared to be lost in space. We put on the amendment providing that these valuable records should no longer be exposed to fire, but should be deposited in that building. The Senate said it was a matter of administration, and the Secretary of the Navy objected, and the Secretary of State objected, but we put in the south and east wings of that building over five hundred clerks and these records, and then they did not take half the space that the fifty-one people had occupied in the south wing. [Laughter.] I repeat, I never knew an executive officer or a bureau officer—and I suppose if I were one I would act in just the same way—I never have seen one of them, Cabinet officer, bureau officer, or executive officer of any kind, who was willing to yield space. They all want room. [Laughter.]

Now, the judgment of Congress has been deliberately expressed, crystallized into legislation, that all these offices should go to this building, and after the law has been changed and modified as I have indicated, allowing several of them to remain where they are, it occurs to me that we had better adhere to the law upon this point and let the Commissioner of Railroads and the Commissioner of Education go into this building.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain to the House the situation. In 1887 we passed a law which required that—

As soon as practicable after the completion as provided for in the sundry civil act approved August 4, 1886, and not later than December 1, 1888, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be removed to the Pension building the General Land Office, the Bureau of Education, the office of the Commissioner of Railroads, and the Bureau of Labor, and vacate the buildings rented for and now occupied by said offices and bureaus or portions thereof.

The Committee on Appropriations moved here to strike out from this requirement the General Land Office, and the Senate has added the Bureau of Education. The Secretary of the Interior asks us to agree to the Senate amendment, for the reason that we have ordered that the city post-office shall be placed in the Pension building, and he desires that we shall wait six months and see what effect that will have. He requests, therefore, that the Senate amendment be agreed to.

In reply to the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the clerical force of the Commissioner of Education is small, I have to say that, while it is small, only about thirty-seven persons, there is a large library, consisting of twenty-seven thousand volumes, which will have to be removed, and for which it is said there is not sufficient room. Two of the conferees have therefore asked that the House recede.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, it has been ascertained there is not in this building to which you propose to remove the Bureau of Education sufficient room to accommodate the bureau proper. Such accommodations as can be there provided are exceedingly inconvenient and unsuitable. There is no place to put this bureau except in the very top of the building, where the thermometer in summer ranges, as I am credibly informed, up to 124°.

I have before me a letter from the Secretary of the Interior which I desire to have read for the information of the House. In this letter it is stated that to save a rental of $4,000, not $6,000, as stated by the gentleman, there will be a loss of $25,000 of the appropriation for this bureau. I have also a letter from the acting Commissioner, giving an itemized statement of the amount of room required, and showing that the accommodations now proposed will be entirely inadequate. I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, July 30, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: I observe that by the sundry civil bill, as it has been reported by the Committee on Appropriations to the Senate, the only repeal of the act of March 3, 1887, which required the removal of the General Land Office, Bureau of Railroads, and Bureau of Education to the Pension building, provided for is so much as relates to the Land Office. I do most sincerely think it will be a serious injury to the Educational Bureau and also to the Pension Bureau to compel the removal of the former into the Pension building. It can not but practically strangle the Bureau of Education, for a considerable period at least, and I can not see but that it must seriously interfere with its usefulness so long as it shall remain there. There are now about forty-three clerks and people employed in the Bureau of Education, and they have a large collection of books, models, educational appliances, and bric-à-brac of various character and all contributory to enlightenment. I have visited the Pension building and can not see how this can be stored, except in great part in the fourth story. Practically, it becomes when placed there unavailable for use.

The appropriation in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill on account of the Bureau of Education is, altogether, $50,920. The rent of the building to be saved by this change is $4,000. In order to save this sum of $4,000 of rent I do not hesitate to say that this action will waste $25,000 of the appropriation for the bureau.

I have heard the idea expressed in casual conversation that the Bureau of Education was not an instrumentality of especial value, and I fear that this idea has had something to do with the willingness to cripple it by this removal.

I do not concur at all in the sentiment; but if the sentiment is to have any influence, and especially under the plea of economy, it should take an effective direction to accomplish the latter end; and this would require that, in case of this removal being insisted upon, a great part of the force should be discharged and the appropriation made for the conduct of the bureau diminished. I do not doubt that it could be diminished one-half, upon the theory of the removal, and as effective work be accomplished as if the same number of officers and employés shall be retained now provided for, because they can not work to advantage in such quarters as can be assigned in the Pension Bureau.

The legislative bill has made provision for the rent of the building now occupied by the Bureau of Education only until the 1st of December next, appropriating $1,667 for that purpose, one-third of the annual rental. The time is short and the pressure upon Congress, and especially upon you, my dear sir, I recognize to be very great at this juncture. Is it not the part of wisdom to continue that bureau where it is for the remainder of this fiscal year, which will involve but $2,333 more (perhaps less than the cost of its removal), and review this subject at the next session with more attention than can now be allowed to it?

If it be possible for yourself, or some member of the committee, to give an hour or an hour and a half to a personal examination of the circumstances, I feel convinced you will recognize by a survey of the buildings and the property involved the imperative urgency and wisdom of the suggestion I venture to make.

The provision for the post-office within the area of the Pension building will make that building as thoroughly occupied as almost any Government building in the city, perhaps quite as much.

I have the honor to be, my dear Mr. Chairman,
Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BURNES, that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 116, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 49, noes 14.

Amendment numbered 118 was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used in the investigation of any case or the prosecution of any person in the mining region of the United States for cutting, for mining or domestic purposes, dwarfed or scrubby timber unfit to be sawed or hewed into lumber of commercial value."

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to this amendment.

Mr. RYAN. The House, if I recollect aright, disagreed to this amendment at the instance of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who stated at the time that he desired to give the conferees some information on the subject. If he has any information, I would like him now to state it to the House, so that we may understand the reasons which actuated him in asking the House to disagree to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is well known we have districts where the public lands are covered with timber which is valuable, and yet not valuable as sawed and hewed timber, and which is manufactured not only into cordwood and charcoal, but is being very rapidly appropriated. The law is liberal as to the timber on the public lands. I find a statement published in The Globe, a leading newspaper of New York City, which seems to be copied from the New York Herald, stating what I understand to be substantially the facts in regard to the manner in which the public lands are being denuded of timber of a commercial value, and of great consequence to the farmers and those engaged in carrying on mining operations. I ask the paragraph of that statement which I have marked be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE INTEREST OF RICH CORPORATIONS.

"The proposed legislation," says Mr. Stockslager, "is purely in the interest of large and wealthy mining corporations, foreign as well as native, and also in the interest of railroad corporations who have in many portions of the country monopolized the cordwood-cutting and charcoal industries. I am warranted in stating that it originated in the desire to prevent the prosecution of anticipated suits which have since been ordered, upon the recommendation of this office, against the Richmond Mining Company and the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, owning mines in Nevada, for the recovery of $9,517,461. The total value of wood and charcoal derived from timber cut by and for these companies upon the public lands aggregates 1,305,964 cords of wood, from a portion of which were derived 28,704,662 bushels of charcoal."

TIMBER LANDS DENUDED.

"These two companies alone have literally laid bare the hills, mountain ranges, and cañons within a radius of 35 miles from Eureka, not sparing the undergrowth, but taking everything from 3 inches and upward, not simply 'dwarfed and scrubby timbers,' but mahogany, cedar, and pine trees. Even the stumps of the trees have been removed. These depredations are rendered the more aggravating by the fact that the Richmond Mining Company is exclusively a foreign and British corporation, organized in London, England, having for its manager an alien, who is a British nobleman connected with the Duke of Northumberland."

Mr. HOLMAN. Whilst this purports to be an interview with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I do not know that it is an exact report of what took place on that occasion, but I have no doubt it substantially states the facts and the view he entertains and expressed. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas whether a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. Stockslager, was not before the conferees?

Mr. RYAN. The conferees had some information of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Otherwise I would have gone before the conferees myself.

If this statement be true, and I think it is, as that is the information I have derived from the Land Office, if what has been read are the exact words of the interview on the part of the Commissioner of the General Land Office—and I do not know whether they are or not, except they substantially agree with the information which I have—if that be true, then this House can not upon that information agree to prohibit or suspend those prosecutions.

Mr. WOODBURN. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the sundry civil bill appropriates $350,000 to protect the public lands, to adjust swamp-land entries, and to guard against depredations of the timber on the public domain. This amendment simply provides that none of that money shall be expended in the investigation or in the prosecution of any person in the mining regions of the United States for cutting dwarf or scrub timber that can not be hewed or squared into timber of commercial value. A Senator from the State of Nevada offered this amendment to the House bill.

No matter whether the article just read at the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be true or not, I say this amendment would never have been necessary except to prevent the repetition of an order by the Commissioner of the General Land Office by virtue of which six miners were arrested in the arid regions of Nevada, and brought 300 miles to the capital at Carson, indicted and tried for misdemeanor in cutting the character of timber described in the amendment. They were acquitted after trial in a court of the United States. To prevent the recurrence of such an order, because other prosecutions are threatened, this amendment was offered.

Every man in that mining region, as well as every corporation, is threatened with civil suits in order to recover the value of the scrub timber cut in the last thirty years, as the statute of limitations does not run against the Government.

If the Richmond Mining Company be liable for cutting this timber, if the Eureka Company is held to be liable, so also is every individual in the entire arid region of Idaho and Colorado. The miners of that region, as well as the corporations, have for the last twenty years enjoyed the right and privilege of cutting that kind of timber without any molestation from the Interior Department. They have been in the undisturbed and notorious possession of that right during all that period. Without that right not a single furnace, quartz-mill, or mine in all this region can be worked at all. It is indispensable to the very existence of the miner, and the framers of this legislation, those who reported the act of 1878, which still stands on the statute-books, and for the violation of which these miners were arrested, when it came into this House from the Senate of the United States, accompanied it with a report which places upon it a construction entirely different from that of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The Committee on the Public Lands of this House must have placed the same construction upon it. The members of the two Houses of Congress who voted for it must have understood it the way the Senate Committee on the Public Lands did. And what do they say? I read from the report:

The committee, having carefully considered the subject of timber and timber lands, and after mature deliberation with a view of devising the best methods of preserving, cultivating, and disposing of the same, have come to the conclusion that a distinction should be made between such trees as grow upon the mountains in the mineral districts, and the forests of pine, oak, and other timber that grow in the more level portions of the country.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nevada will suspend.

The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, in obedience to its previous order, takes a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the indulgence of the members present to permit me to call up this evening the bill (S. 2356) to provide a pension for Mrs. Adeline Couzins. I have had no recognitions whatever during all of our meetings here to call up a bill. This is the first time that I have made a request in that direction. This lady was actually wounded on the field of battle while attending to our wounded soldiers. I simply ask recognition now to take up this bill before going into the Committee of the Whole, and put it upon its passage.

Mr. RYAN. There are other very meritorious bills, and I think we had better proceed in the regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection to this bill.

Mr. RYAN. I am not objecting to the bill. I am only insisting that we can get along a great deal better by proceeding in the regular way.

RECOMMITMENT OF A BILL.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2490) granting a pension to Nicholas T. Lawrence, be taken from the Committee of the Whole House and recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. I make this motion at the request of some of the members of the committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands there is objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. PAYSON. I have not risen to object to the request of the gentleman from Missouri, but I desire to give notice that after his request is disposed of I will make a motion that the recognitions this evening be accorded to the members present, as was done on last Friday; that is, that the roll be called in alphabetical order, to begin from where the call ended on the last evening.

Mr. CHIPMAN. That was the motion the committee intended to make.

Mr. PAYSON. After the disposal of the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, I desire to submit that request.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. PAYSON. I make the motion I have indicated.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills under the special order.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee resume the call of the roll where we left off on last Friday night, and that each member as his name is reached be permitted to call up one bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Where did the call end before?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that the call ended with the name of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then I object.

Mr. RYAN. Then let us have a vote on the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his objection.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I shall not insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will regard the objection as withdrawn; and if there be no further objection that order will be pursued this evening.

There was no objection.

MARGARET GRAY.

Mr. POST. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 11057) granting a pension to Margaret Gray.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Gray, mother of Wilson S. Gray, deceased, late of Company G, Eleventh Illinois Cavalry.

The report by (Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

Margaret Gray is the mother of Wilson S. Gray, who enlisted in Company G, Eleventh Regiment Illinois Cavalry, and was killed November 17, 1864, near McDonough, Ga. Her claim for pension has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the soldier was not killed in the line of duty.

The report of the Adjutant-General shows that the soldier was killed at the time and place alleged by a pistol shot fired by a comrade, J. W. Todd, who was tried by a general court-martial for murder, and convicted of the crime.

It appears from the testimony produced before the court-martial that Gray on the day of the shooting received permission from the commanding officer, while on the march, to go from the road to forage. He was accompanied by J. W. Todd and two or three others of the command. Todd had been drinking, and when the rest of the foragers wanted to return to the regiment he refused unless he would be furnished another drink.

After he was given a drink he again refused to go to the camp, and wheeled his horse in the opposite direction. Gray and one Thomas Conner, anxious to have him return to camp safe, followed up and tried to persuade him to go with them. While Gray was close up to Todd the latter pulled his revolver and shot at Gray, killing him almost instantly. It further appears from the evidence that up to that time Gray and Todd were intimate friends, and always, if possible, in each other's company.

The captain of this company testifies that he detailed Gray to go out as a foraging squad under a non-commissioned officer. While at a plantation J. W. Todd, one of the party, got some kind of liquor and became crazy drunk, and would not leave the place with the others of the party. He was left, but fearing that he might be picked up by the enemy, Gray returned, and while attempting to persuade him to return, he, Todd, pulled his revolver and shot Gray through the body.

The captain further states that Gray was a splendid soldier, always ready for duty, and never intoxicated.

The claimant was dependent upon the son at time of his enlistment. She has no income from any source except that derived from her own labor and the labor of the soldier's father, which is inadequate to a comfortable support because of his physical disabilities which have existed for many years past.

There is nothing in the evidence in the case, including the testimony taken before the court-martial in the trial of Todd, pointing towards any personal difficulty between the parties up to the time of the firing of the fatal shot, or any misconduct or provocation on the part of the murdered man. On the other hand, it is clearly shown that he was in the act of attempting to keep out of difficulty one who up to that time had been a friend.

The committee are of the opinion that this old and dependent claimant should have the relief asked for, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES HAHNEMAN.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I call up the bill (H. R. 11021) to increase the pension of Charles Hahneman.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to increase the pension of Charles Hahneman, late a private in Company C, Forty-first New York Volunteers, and pay him at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension now paid to him.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11021) to increase the pension of Charles Hahneman, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Charles Hahneman is now on the pension-roll at $24 per month for right inguinal hernia under special act approved February 4, 1887. In addition to this unusual great disability he is a great sufferer from asthma, which, however, is not satisfactorily showu as chargeable to his military service, although its existence ever since discharge is clearly established. The hernia was incurred in the service by being struck with a musket in the hands of a Confederate soldier.

The increase to $24 by special act from $16 per month previously allowed by the Pension Bureau was based upon the rating of the Albany, N. Y., medical board on October 20, 1886. The disability has much increased since that date, but inasmuch as the special act fixed a rate for the pension the Pension Bureau is estopped from granting a pension for this increased disability.

Pensioner has filed with your committee the affidavits of three reputable physicians who have given him careful examination, and who, in substance, make the following statement regarding the disability:

"He has right inguinal hernia, descending into and distending the scrotum to a great size. The circumference at the largest part is 17½ inches, and at its smaller part, close to the body, is 16½ inches. The inguinal ring is 3 inches in its largest diameter and 1 inch in its shortest diameter. The hernia can not be entirely reduced, and constantly fills the scrotum, rendering him entirely helpless. The hernia totally disables him, and he has to be constantly waited upon. The care of him is unusually laborious and wearing. For the past two years he has been unable to wear any truss; he can not sleep at night on account of the asthma; the cough increases the size of the hernia; heart disease also adds to his deplorable condition."

A number of neighbors also testify to the pensioner's helplessness and the necessity of constant aid and attendance of another person.

From all the evidence before your committee they are of opinion that the pension now paid Hahneman is entirely inadequate to the degree of disability from his Army injury, and therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the word "fifty," in line 6, and inserting therein instead the words "forty-five."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I will have to make a row about this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it?

Mr. KILGORE. My understanding of the history of this case is that this man was put upon the roll by a special act of Congress. He was originally put on the roll by a special act, and it is proposed now by a further special act to increase the pension from $25 to $45 per month. I think in such cases there is something due to the office, after an impartial and thorough investigation has once been made which has resulted in the rejection of the claim. There ought to be some respect paid to the department and to its judgment.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, a special act was passed upon my presenting a bill to the House for that purpose in 1887. At that time the committee thought that $24 a month was the proper amount to rate this man's disability. The committee now think it should be $45 a month, as the applicant is utterly helpless.

This man was injured while in the service, as the report which has been read shows, by a blow from a musket in the hands of a Confederate soldier. The case as originally presented to the Pension Office lacked certain elements of evidence; so that that office, while it accorded him a pension of $12 a month, thought he ought not to have the $24 to which under the law he was entitled for that degree of disability; but while the bill was pending in the House he received the pension of $12 a month at the Pension Office.

The reason some evidence was lacking originally in the case was because the applicant was a member of a German regiment raised in New York. It was nearly cut to pieces, and it was almost impossible to procure the evidence of any of his comrades.

Mr. KILGORE. Was there an application made at the office?

Mr. ROCKWELL. Yes, sir; and they granted him a pension of $12 a month.

Mr. KILGORE. You say there was an application for an increase at the office?

Mr. ROCKWELL. No, sir; you can not make an application for an increase of the pension at the office where a pension has been granted by a special act of Congress. It takes it out of the category of claims which are considered by the office. When once a bill of this class has been passed by the House it takes it out of the jurisdiction of the Pension Department, and the man has got to come to Congress for additional relief. That is the reason that the application is not now made at the Pension Office.

Mr. KILGORE. Put it at $25 a month and I will not make any objection.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I put it originally at $50 a month upon suggestion from the committee.

Mr. KILGORE. I know.

Mr. ROCKWELL. And the committee have reduced it to the amount fixed in the bill. Although this man is on his death-bed, I would not consent to $25 a month. I know the case personally; I know the applicant. I will not stand as a Representative upon this floor and accept in a case of this kind what I do not regard to be just or right. I think if the gentleman from Texas will consider the matter he will himself understand the position here and agree with me. The man is now getting $24 a month, and this only increases the amount to $45. He is perfectly helpless, and will be on the roll but for a short time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The name of Mr. ROMEIS was called.

Mr. ROMEIS. The bill I intended to call up I am informed is in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill the gentleman has sent to the desk is one on the special roll, and is not subject to consideration in the committee.

CARL M. SCHWANTES.

Mr. RYAN. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2716) granting a pension to Carl M. Schwantes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Carl M. Schwantes, late private Company K, Fifty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2716) granting a pension to Carl M. Schwantes, submit the following report:

The report of the Committae on Pensions in the Senate sets forth clearly the facts in this case, and is hereby adopted, and the passage of the bill recommended.

[Senate Report No. 1271, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The claimant under this bill enlisted August 27, 1861, and served until July 25, 1865, when he was honorably discharged from the service of the United States, and mustered out under General Order No. 26, at Louisville, Ky.

On July 12, 1881, he made application for pension, alleging as a basis for his claim "that while on guard February 3, 1865, from cold and exposure his system suffered severely, and he has never recovered his health."

In a subsequent affidavit, filed November 20, 1882, he claims pension on account of "chronic inflammation of kidneys."

The claim was rejected March 14, 1883, by the Commissioner of Pensions, on the ground of "claimant's failure, after a reasonable time and due notification, to furnish the necessary evidence to establish it."

The records of the War Department furnish nothing to support the allegations of the claimant. The claimant in his original declaration explains that on the 3d day of February, 1865, while in the service and line of duty, in obedience to the orders of his superior officers, he waded through some twenty-four streams of water during the march; that the weather was cold, and that he was chilled through; that on the night of February 3, 1865, he was detailed for duty with his company on picket line, and that he staid on picket duty all night; that his clothing and person were wet and cold, and through the exposure thus caused and other exposure suffered on the same campaign * * * he contracted the disabilities alleged in his declaration, and that he is now entirely disabled and unable to attend to his business, that of a farmer. He further states he is unable to furnish medical testimony of treatment in service, for the reason "that no physician treated him for said disease of the kidneys, as he was not always near a physician, and used such household remedies as he could obtain."

Capt. D. H. McFadden, commanding the company, says: "Probably resulted in the injuries he sustained." Captain McFadden fully corroborates the claimant as to the march through the swamps and subsequent duty on the picket line. This is also set forth in the affidavit of J. M. Jones, private of Company G, same regiment, but only knows of the disability "by the statement of the claimant." Same statement substantially is made by Comrade E. R. Hay, of Company G, who says that claimant "claims to have taken cold, so he was disabled thereby."

William H. Throckmorton and George W. Keever swear May 7, 1881, to an acquaintance of twenty-five and twenty-two years, respectively; that he was physically a sound man prior to enlistment; and that at date of discharge they knew he was broken in health and unable to earn a living by manual labor: that his disability has continued from date of discharge to present time, and that they believe his sickness and general disability was caused by exposure while in the service of the United States, and in the line of his duty.

A. W. Jones, January 4, 1882, swears to an acquaintance of eight years last past; that he was sick and unable to work for a considerable portion of the time, * * * physically unable to do a full man's work. The credibility of affiants is fully established by the certificates of postmasters.

The examining surgeon at Burlington, Kans., March 1, 1882, gives him a rating of one-fourth total for colds and other disabilities, and that the disability is probably permanent.

The board of surgeons at Emporia, Kans., rate him at the same, one-fourth total, on "claimant's statement, which we believe to be true," for kidney disease.

The incurrence of the disabilities alleged in the service and line of duty is not very clearly established, except by the sworn statements of the claimant himself; and, taking into consideration his excellent character for truth and veracity furnished by leading citizens of Burlington, Kans., his present abode, and his present financial and physical condition, your committee feel justified in recommending the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SYLVESTER STEARNS.

Mr. SENEY. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7516) to increase the pension of Sylvester Stearns.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and authorized to increase the pension of Sylvester Stearns, of Fostoria, Ohio, late a member of Company K, Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, to $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7516) granting an increase of pension to Sylvester Stearns, submit the following report:

Sylvester Stearns, private of Company K, Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, enlisted September 5, 1861; discharged November 30, 1864; filed his application for pension in the Pension Office January 17, 1865; granted a pension of $15 a month to date from June 6, 1866; $18 a month from June 4, 1872; $20 a month from March 3, 1883, for a gunshot wound of the left shoulder, received at the battle of Chickamauga Creek, September 20, 1863. Hospital report shows gunshot wound, left humerus. His captain states on oath that claimant was wounded in the left shoulder joint at the battle of Chickamauga. Ex-surgeon J. H. Haer, December 10, 1864, reports him totally disabled by reason of gunshot wound in left shoulder, fracturing head and neck of the humerus, entire use of the left arm lost.

The last board of examining surgeons, composed of Thomas I. Lewis, George L. Creg, and James F. E. Fanning, at Tiffin, Ohio, July 29, 1885, testify to his total second grade disability on account of gunshot wound, left shoulder joints, and results, and that the disability has increased. He has pain of neuralgic character in both shoulders, which is so severe that he can not sleep at night. He is weaker and has more pain in the left shoulder than when present rating was granted. They further said that upon examining the applicant they found in relation of height to the weight, emaciation and atrophy of the muscles of the left shoulder, and that he does not follow or gratify any vicious habits.

After a careful examination by your committee of this case we are satisfied that his disabilities are of the progressive nature and constantly increasing, and according to evidence on file that his entire system has been affected as to cause partial paralysis, and that he is clearly entitled to an increase of pension, and recommend that the bill do pass, with an amendment, by striking out, in lines 6 and 7, "$50," and inserting "$36" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH G. SCOTT.

Mr. STEELE. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 944) increasing the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth G. Scott.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Goodale Scott, widow of Robert N. Scott, deceased, late lieutenant-colonel Third United States Artillery, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the amount now received by law.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 944) increasing the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth G. Scott, would report as follows:

The committee recommend that the bill pass, and adopt the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, as follows:

The late Robert N. Scott, lieutenant-colonel Third Artillery, entered the service as second lieutenant, February 21, 1857. During the war of the rebellion he was transferred to the Adjutant-General's department, rendering service therein and in the field, which was rewarded by two brevets and honorable mention in general orders. After the war he served as aid-de-camp on the staff of General Halleck until 1872; professor of military science and tactics at Faribault, Minn., until 1873; commander of his battery until 1877; and from that date until his death, in 1887, he was engaged in the compilation and publication of the official records of the Union and Confederate armies. Added to these duties he was, during 1877 and afterwards, variously employed in the compilation of Army regulations, as secretary to a Congressional commission on the reorganization of the Army, and as a member of the Army Regulations Board.

The work of compiling and publishing the records of the Union and Confederate armies, on which Colonel Scott was engaged during the last ten years of his life, was probably the most involved and difficult ever imposed upon a military compiler. To cull and arrange out of the confused and sometimes chaotic mass of Union and Confederate reports a full, just, and intelligible history of events, and omitting therefrom the vast body of superfluous or irrelevant material, required industry, patience, and methodic intelligence of the highest order. These qualities Colonel Scott manifestly possessed, for his labors received the highest commendation of his superiors and military critics at home and abroad. He prosecuted the work with a zeal which surpassed enthusiasm, and amounted to an utter absorption of time and faculty, for during all these years it is certified that he never took a holiday, nor spared time for a midday lunch; and that when office was closed he carried papers home with him and remained engaged on them, as a habit, until after midnight. This continuous labor, without recreation, wore out his strength until, when he was attacked by a slight cold, he had no vitality to resist it, and died. Surgeon O'Reilly, of the Army, who was for years his physician, states:

"I look on his death as being as much caused by his entire devotion to the Government service as though he had been killed in battle."

Services of a quasi extraofficial character like these by Colonel Scott, and of equal difficulty and importance, performed through a series of years and with so total a disregard of the limitations of prudence and duty, are not compensated for by mere pay and allowances. Nor, while the country neither exacts nor desires of its agents unreasonable service, can it afford to allow patriotic sacrifice to go unrecognized. It is plain that this officer, in his enthusiastic devotion to duty, the performance of which he felt could neither be shared nor delayed, went down to his grave before his time, depriving the country of superior talents especially trained and prematurely removing from his family their protection and support. The committee, having just appreciation of Colonel Scott's labors, and believing that excessive devotion to duty is not likely to grow into a habit so common as to become a burdensome precedent, think it reasonable that the pension to his widow should, as asked, be increased to the moderate sum of $50 per month; and they recommend the passage of the bill to that end.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, this bill is one of the same character to which I have heretofore objected unless acted upon by a quorum.

Mr. STEELE. I am perfectly content that the bill shall stand upon its own merits, and let the House act upon it.

Mr. CHEADLE. I am perfectly willing that this bill shall take the same course which has been pursued in similar bills; that it go over to be voted upon in a full House.

Mr. STEELE. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. CHEADLE. Let the bill and report be printed in the RECORD and go over to a full House.

Mr. STEELE. There will be no opposition to this bill. I am entirely satisfied that the bill shall stand upon its own merits. This officer was literally worn out in the service. He leaves a widow with five daughters surviving him, and they are entirely dependent.

I ask that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that the previous question be ordered upon it, with the right of fifteen minutes' debate on each side, and that its consideration be postponed until to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Can this committee make an order which will bind the House?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the committee only makes a recommendation, which must be ratified by the House.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NELSON J. CROOK.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 3801) granting a pension to Nelson J. Crook.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Nelson J. Crook, late a member of Company D, of the Third Missouri Cavalry Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. WALKER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3801) granting a pension to Nelson J. Crook, make the following report:

The bill is to grant a pension to Nelson J. Crook, private in Company D, Third Missouri Cavalry. The claim for pension is based on an alleged injury to the eyes received in line of duty during the military service of the claimant.

The evidence clearly shows that the claimant's eyes are in bad condition. He swears that the vision of his right eye is so defective that he could not with that eye distinguish a man from a horse at a distance of 25 feet, nor with the left eye at a distance of 100 feet.

There is an abundance of testimony, apparently of the most creditable kind, showing that claimant's eye sight is practically gone.

The examining surgeon stated in 1881 that he found both eyes in a state of chronic inflammation and ulcerated, and estimated his disability at not less than one-half. The only question is whether this disability is the result of an injury received in the line of duty while in the military service of the United States, as the claimant alleges the fact to be.

The claimant himself swears that his eyes were sound and his sight good prior to his enlistment. That statement is corroborated by the affidavits of his brother and his acquaintances, as well, also, as by several of his comrades, who swear that he had good, sound eyes when he enlisted and until he was hurt.

The only contradictory testimony on this point is a letter, not sworn to, written by the postmaster at Monticello, Mo., in response to an office letter written by the Commissioner of Pensions asking information as to claimant. The postmaster did not know the claimant, but he wrote that he had learned from others that claimant and his father and brothers and sisters had all been afflicted with sore eyes before the war; that it was a sort of sore-eyed family.

We are of opinion, however, that this hearsay and unverified statement of the postmaster ought not even to be considered, much less prevail against the sworn statements of eight or ten reputable witnesses.

We think, then, there can be no controversy over these two propositions:

1. That claimant had good, sound eyes at the date of his enlistment.
2. That at the date of his discharge his eyes were in a diseased condition, and have so remained ever since, growing constantly worse, until he is now nearly blind.

The remaining question is the important one. Is this diseased condition of his eyes the result of his military service, and, if so, in what way?

The claimant alleges that in April, 1864, while out with his company, or a part of it, under orders, and while marching, a comrade by the name of Hart, who was riding directly in front of claimant, caught hold of a limb and let it fly back, and that it struck claimant across his nose and right eye, inflicting a severe and painful injury.

The claimant says that he continued to suffer from the injury during the remainder of his service, and ever since. He did not go to the hospital, nor abandon his command, but was treated by Dr. Taylor, the regimental surgeon. Dr. Taylor was killed in 1866, and his comrade, Hart, who held the limb, is dead. No commissioned officer was sworn in the case. The captain of the company and the major of the regiment were asked for statements, but were unable to recall the circumstances or give any information. The affidavits of six or eight comrades were obtained, however, and filed. None actually saw the limb strike the claimant, but they swear that they saw the claimant immediately afterwards, observed his injuries, heard him complaining of great pain, and heard both claimant and Hart describe how it had happened.

Unless the statements of the claimant and six of his comrades are to be discredited, there would seem to exist no reason for doubting that claimant was injured as he alleges. His comrades also testify that he continued to suffer from said injury during the remainder of his service and to the day of his discharge.

We think the testimony sufficiently shows—

1. That claimant had sound eyes when he enlisted.
2. That he was injured in his right eye while in the line of duty and in the way described.
3. That the injury was continuing at the date of his discharge, and that both eyes had become affected.

As to the continuance of the disability since his discharge the evidence is not as satisfactory as might be desired. He never had his eyes treated by any physician, except one traveling oculist, whose whereabouts are unknown. The testimony is that he treated himself the best he could. There is testimony of neighbors and acquaintances of the continuance of the disability after claimant's discharge in 1864. R. T. Crook, brother of claimant, testified that to his knowledge claimant had been suffering from his injury ever since December, 1864. The claim was filed in 1872.

David R. Jones and John N. Bright testify that they had employed and worked with claimant at different times for six years prior thereto, and "throughout that period he had labored with great difficulty on account of his eyes."

There is other testimony of the same import. The following is the judgment, so to speak, of the reviewer rejecting the claim:

"No record, commissioned officer, or medical treatment in or out of service, nor sufficient proof of contracting in service and line of duty."

It is true the claim is not proven by the testimony of a commissioned officer; nor is there any medical testimony. It is proven, however, that claimant was treated in the field by the regimental surgeon, who died, or was killed, in 1866.

Upon a careful review of all the evidence your committee is of opinion that the claimant is entitled to pension, and the bill is accordingly reported with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH G. SCOTT.

Mr. STEELE. I understand that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has the right of way immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, and I ask that the recommendation to the House that the bill granting a pension to Elizabeth G. Scott be taken up in the House for consideration immediately after the Journal to-morrow morning be modified so that it may be taken up after that matter is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. If it is merely a difference between "before taking and after taking" I will not object, but if I had been present "before taking" I would have objected.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SICKNESS OF CHAIRMAN.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOCKERY). The Chair will request the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to take the chair, as the present occupant is unwell and desires to leave the House.

Mr. SPRINGER took the chair.

MATHEW O. REGAN.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 3118) for the relief of Mathew O. Regan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Mathew O. Regan, late of Company E, Third United States Artillery, now on pension-roll for loss of his right arm at elbow-joint, the amount allowed for loss of arm at or above elbow where artificial limb can not be worn, according to provisions of act increasing pensions approved August 4, 1886, instead of the rate he has been receiving.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3118) for the relief of Mathew O. Regan, have examined the same and report:

Mathew O. Regan was a private in Company E, Third United States Artillery. He lost his right arm in 1863, for which he was pensioned at the rate provided by law. He was afterwards pensioned by special act at the rate of $30 per month, on the ground that the amputation is so near to the elbow-joint that it is not possible to use the stump or to attach to it any artificial appliance, so that the disability is equal to an amputation above the elbow-joint. Under existing general law he is entitled to the pension he is now receiving, $30 a month.

The law approved August 4, 1886, provides that all persons now on the pension-rolls, and all persons hereafter granted a pension, who shall have lost either an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension of $36 a month. The committee is of the opinion that the disability is equal to an ordinary amputation above the elbow, and there can be no doubt of the fact that the arm is totally disabled.

The bill is therefore reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SMITH BODKINS.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 6022) granting a pension to Smith Bodkins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Smith Bodkins, late a private in Company E, Twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, who is now blind, at the rate of $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

Smith Bodkins enlisted in Company C, Twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteers, United States Army, on June 10, 1861, and was discharged June 14, 1865. While at Camp Chase he claims that he contracted measles, which produced sore eyes, having been exposed to cold and wet weather during his illness. The soreness of his eyes continued after he had recovered from the other effects of the disease, and he is now totally blind. He was excused from duty on account of this disability, and by some error was marked as a deserter, which charge was afterward removed.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that blindness was not due to military service; that claimant had measles shortly before entering the service, and that he only suffered a relapse. But the evidence on file proves that he was a stout, hearty man when he entered the service; that he suffered with sore eyes after his discharge, and that he has been totally blind for many years. He is also badly ruptured, caused by a fall on account of being unable to see. He has a family to support; is totally blind, and is in great distress on account of poverty. Your committee be ieve he is entitled to the aid he asks for, and recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "fifty," in the last line of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty," and, when so amended, that the bill do pass.

The amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH F. HAWKINS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 508) granting a pension to Sarah F. Hawkins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll of the United States the name of Sarah F. Hawkins, widow of Martin J. Hawkins, late of Company A, Thirty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and who was one of the so-called "Mitchell raiders" sent out in 1862 by General O. M. Mitchell, for certain hazardous military purposes, at the rate of $24 per month, in lieu of the pension now paid to her.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect as of the date of July 1, 1884.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 508) granting an increase of pension to Sarah F. Hawkins, having considered the same, report as follows:

Martin J. Hawkins, the husband of the beneficiary of this bill, was a sergeant of Company A, Thirty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted August 27, 1861; re-enlisted January 1, 1864; was mustered out July 12, 1865, and died February 7, 1886. About April 7, 1862, General P. W. Mitchell sent a secret expedition into Georgia along the Atlanta and Chattanooga Railroad, well known in history as the "Mitchell raiders." The party was made up of volunteers from different regiments. Martin J. Hawkins was one of the volunteers.

Prisoner of war records show that he was taken prisoner April 12, 1862; was confined at Atlanta, Ga., June 19, 1862, where he petitioned that his life might be spared. On November 18, 1862, he escaped. On May 19, 1869, he applied for a pension, and on December 23, 1869, was granted a pension at $8 per month from July 13, 1865, the date of his discharge, for "scurvy and debility and other results of prison life." Afterwards, on July 7, 1884, his pension was increased by special act to $24 per month.

His death was caused by the disease for which he was pensioned, and on the 29th of January, 1887, a pension was granted to his widow, the beneficiary of this bill. By special legislation each one of the survivors of the party known as the "Mitchell Raiders" has been placed on the pension-roll at $24 per month, and Rachael Slavins, widow of Samuel Slavins, deceased, who was one of the party, has also been placed on the pension-roll at the same rate, and we believe that it is only fair that this widow should be pensioned at that rate.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out the second section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM THIELDS.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 3035) to grant a pension to William Thields.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, and hereby directed, to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Thields, late a private of Company H, Eighth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3035) to grant a pension to William Thields, submit the following report:

The report of the Committee on Pensions in the Senate contains a full and complete statement of the case, and your committee adopt that report and recommend the passage of the bill.

SENATE REPORT.

This bill proposes to place on the pension-rolls the name of William Thields, late of Company H, Eighth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry. The soldier enlisted August 16, 1861, and was discharged July 9, 1862, on a surgeon's certificate of disability, "because of a tendency to consumption, resulting from an imperfect recovery from typhoid fever." On July 27, 1879, he made application for a pension, alleging "that at Hilton Head, S. C., November 20, 1861, he contracted typhoid fever, from the results of which disease of lungs, eyes, and legs ensued, and said diseases still exist."

The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim November 24, 1885, on the ground, after a special examination—

"That the disease of lungs and eyes did not originate in the United States service, but existed prior to first enlistment, and that the evidence does not show that disease of legs originated while in the service, or has continued to exist since discharge, or has disabled the claimant in a pensionable degree since the date of filing his claim therefor."

The Adjutant-General's report shows that the claimant was present with his company during September and October, 1861, and that he was absent on a three months' furlough from December 5, 1861, and same report until discharged, July 9, 1862, upon surgeon's certificate, as before stated.

The Adjutant-General also reports a second enlistment by this claimant as follows, namely:

"William Thields, a private of Company A, First Regiment Michigan Light Artillery, was enrolled on the 30th day of August, 1864, at Grand Rapids, Mich., for one year, and was mustered out with company July 28, 1865, at Jackson, Mich."

The complainant furnishes in support of his claim the affidavits of Charles H. Miell, J. Van Houten, Adilene Van Houten, Sophia Thields, and Emma A. Thields, all witnesses of established credibility, who testify positively to the soundness of claimant prior to enlistment.

Joshua V. Noah swears that his health was good; knew of no disease. This witness is strongly biased against the claimant.

Henrietta Wood swears his health was good.

Orange P. Noah "has no knowledge but that he was sound."

Dr. C. M. Slawson "knew claimant since 1854; * * * was in good health; has no recollection of treating him."

David R. Goodman first knew claimant at enlistment in Company H, Eighth Michigan; thought him in average health then; heard of no complaint.

Charles Cross, acquainted with claimant fifteen or twenty years before enlistment; was sound; was present and saw claimant examined by Dr. Shanks, and heard him pronounced sound.

Dr. Herbert B. Shanks, late surgeon of Eighth Michigan, examined all the men of that regiment who enlisted in August, 1861, and did not accept any men afflicted with permanent disease of eyes or lungs. Believes from conversations with claimant that he examined him and passed him as all right.

Margaret H. Spencer, Lewis Mann, Mary Butler, Calvin L. Mann, John H. Van Ness all swear to prior soundness.

Hezekiah Fish, a close neighbor, swears claimant was able-bodied and above the average in physical strength, an expert rifleman. Maranda Fish, Lucy Gilmore, Samuel Gilmore, and Ira W. Barlow, in all twenty-two witnesses, swear to prior soundness. Mary McCabe swears that claimant had sore and watery eyes prior to enlistment and coughed some.

L. D. Kughn and John P. Kughn swear to weak and watery eyes before enlistment, but no recollection of cough. Claimant swears "that he did not know the Kughns prior to first enlistment, and says they could not have known his condition before service." This is corroborated by T. J. Van Houten.

R. W. Vantress knew claimant since 1855; saw him often; was very stout, tough man; recollects no cough, but thinks his eyes had a watery appearance; health remarkably good.

Noble H. Gilmore knew claimant since 1857; worked with him; heard no complaints, except as to his eye; eye was watery; no knowledge of cough.

Elizabeth Flake swears claimant always had sore eyes and cough; eyes looked red and pimply around edges; can not be mistaken about claimant's condition prior to August, 1861.

(The special examiner reports Mrs. Flake as strongly biased against claimant, and unreliable.)

Charles E. Wood swears that at the time the special examiner was investigating this case he heard Mrs. Flake boast that she had stopped claimant's pension, and was glad of it; she could not get one herself and did not propose to pay taxes to pay them to others.

Joshua H. Noath:

"No recollection of claimant's having a bad cough; can not say whether or not he had sore eyes, but his 'impression is' he had sore eyes before enlistment."

William Nooh:

"Has no recollection of cough or lung disease; on reflection it does seem as if he had weak eyes prior to enlistment, but can not say."

James L. Mann:

"Claimant had hacking cough, and had weak, watery eyes—was wiping them almost all the time. Remembers distinctly these disabilities existed before enlistment."

Rev. Vantress, comrade:

"Thinks claimant had fever on board the Vanderbilt. Saw him last at Hilton Head; sat up with him. Had diarrhea at Annapolis soon after enlistment, sore eyes and cough, too; fever afterwards on the Vanderbilt; Dr. Wooster said so. Do not think his eyes any worse in the service than before."

David R. Goodman, comrade:

"Claimant remained in good health until about a month after arrival at Hilton Head. * * * No knowledge of sore eyes and cough while in service."

Charles Coon was in claimant's company, and believes his disease was contracted in service and line of duty.

T. J. Vanhauten swears "that he saw claimant in January, 1862, when he returned home on furlough; he was emaciated, had sore eyes and weak lungs." This affiant is fully corroborated by the affidavits of Adeline Vanhauten, Henrietta Ward, Sophia Thield, Emma Thield, L. D. Kuhn, John P. Kuhn, and Margaret Spence.

Claimant and wife swear that he was not examined for enlistment at second service, and that he enlisted to save draft.

The claimant explains that he was informed that his discharge from former service would not exempt him from military duty, and rather than be drafted he volunteered, but was not examined. His wife swears that she sent claimant medicine for eyes and cough in second service, and that she received ninety-six letters from him, in which he would speak of his condition.

The condition of claimant since discharge in 1862 is fully shown in the testimony on file in the case, and shows that he has been disabled for the performance of manual labor for one-half of the time.

Dr. W. D. Jenkins, examining surgeon at Kirwin, Kans., under date of February 20, 1881, rates claimant at "total, and thinks he should be allowed $8 per month for disability resulting from typhoid fever.":

C. J. Holmes, examining surgeon, Gaylord, Kans., rates him at one-half total, $4, for disease of eyes.

The case was specially examined by examiners in the field. Henry A. Peed, special examiner, is of the opinion "that the claim, so far as relates to disease of eyes, should be rejected, and that for disease of the lungs is without merit," but recommends further examination.

M. G. Wright, special examiner, "thinks the claim for disease of eyes should be rejected."

C. H. St. John, special examiner, "believes claim one of merit, and recommends submission for lung disease, resulting from typhoid fever."

C. W. Akey, special examiner:

"The claimant seems to be a very worthy man, and tells a straight story and a very probable one, * * * and every person with whom I talked about his case fully sustains the evidence. * * * I believe the case to be a worthy one, and recommend further examination."

C. E. Foot, special examiner: "The case seems to be meritorious as to disease of lungs," and recommends further examination.

Your committee are of the opinion that lung disease as a result of typhoid fever is clearly established, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and the House bill of similar title was ordered to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

ELLEN KELLY.

Mr. LANE. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 4820) granting a pension to Ellen Kelly. This is a bill of Mr. SPRINGER, who being in the chair had not the opportunity to call it up when his name was reached.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and required to place on the pension-roll the name of Ellen Kelly, widow of John Kelly, late a private in Company F of the Nineteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and grant her a pension according to the provisions of the pension laws of the United States.

The report (by Mr. LANE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4820) for the relief of Ellen Kelly, beg leave to report:

The committee have considered the same and find, from the evidence in this case, that John Kelly, the husband of the complainant, enlisted August 10, 1862, in Company F, Nineteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and was honorably discharged June 18, 1865, because of injuries received in the service, and he died of his injuries September 26, 1866. It appears from the evidence that the soldier was wounded in battle on two different occasions, and for which wounds he was receiving a pension at the time of his death. The claim of the widow for a pension was rejected by the Pension Department on the ground that the death of the soldier was not due to his military service.

This is a case of disagreement among doctors.

Alexander Moore testified that he knew the soldier; that he was in the same rifle-pit when the soldier was wounded; that the soldier came home by reason of his wounds and was greatly disabled by said wounds; that the direct cause of the soldier's death was the wounds so received in battle.

Charles Murray, also a comrade of the soldier, testified to the same facts, and that the cause of death of the soldier was the wounds received in the service. Rose Murray testifies to the same facts, and this testimony is sustained by many other facts in the record. Dr. B. F. Stanly, of Springfield, Ill., a physician of thirty-six years' standing, on his oath states that he knew the soldier, and gives it as his "medical opinion" that the death of the soldier was caused by wounds received in the service.

The testimony of Charles Ryan, the attending physician of the soldier, tends to support the testimony of Dr. Stanly, aforesaid.

It is further in evidence that on one occasion, when the soldier was returning to his home from his company on a furlough, he was injured in a collision of his train on the Lafayette and Indianapolis Railroad, and in the opinion of R. W. O'Ferral, M. D., this injury was the cause of his death. Dr. Stanly has filed a subsequent affidavit in which he materially modifies his former statement in regard to the death of the soldier. Yet the fact remains that the soldier died from injuries, and he received injuries in the service in battle for which he was receiving a pension at the time of his death, and the testimony fully shows that from the time he received these wounds he was in continued failing health, which would eventually result in death.

The injuries that it is claimed he received in the collision with the train were received about two years prior to his death. Now, the committee in considering the cause of death of the soldier would be required to take into consideration all the injuries received by the soldier that might cause his death. While it is true that he was returning home on a furlough, which it is shown was granted for the purpose of permitting the soldier to go home in order to vote, there is also some testimony tending to show that the furlough was granted on account of sickness, and that the soldier understood that the furlough was so issued; but whether that is so or not, it is certain this furlough could properly have been issued on the ground of sickness of the soldier, for testimony shows that the soldier was severely injured prior to the issuance of this furlough, and was then suffering from the same, and the commttee think that the family of the soldier should not suffer because the furlough was issued on one ground and not on another; and if the furlough had been granted on the ground of sickness, upon which it could have been granted, then there would be no question but that all the injuries received by the soldier would be received in the line of duty, and such injuries having caused his death, the widow would be entitled to a pension.

The committee therefore think that the injuries from which the soldier died were received in line of duty, and are the result of military service of the soldier, and therefore report the bill back with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan (during the reading of the report). We know from whom this bill emanates, and I move that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. KILGORE. I think we had better have the report read.

The reading of the report was concluded.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RICHARD JOBES.

Mr. VANCE. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8748) to increase the pension of Richard Jobes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Richard Jobes, late of Company D, Sixteenth Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8748) to increase the pension of Richard Jobes, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The beneficiary named in the bill, while serving as corporal of Company D, Sixteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, lost his left fore-arm in the battle of Antietam. At the first amputation a nerve was tied in with the ligatures so as to cause excruciating pain, and in a year afterward a second operation was determined upon, and the nerve was cut out for some distance above the point of amputation. This operation, however, failed to give any relief, and, as shown by the medical evidence on file, the pensioner has since then suffered very great pain on account of said wound, and is for a greater part of the time unable to take any exercise or do anything that tends to create heat without great suffering.

Recognizing this aggravation of the loss of the arm, Congress passed a bill, which was approved July 5, 1884, increasing Jobes's pension to $30 per month, the amount then provided by law for the amputation of an arm at or above the elbow. Since that date the pension for the last-named disabilities has been increased to $36, the amount asked for in the accompanying bill. As the pensioner can not be further increased under the provisions of the general pension laws, and as with increasing age his condition becomes more serious, your committee, fully recognizing the propriety of the former action of Congress in increasing his pension beyond the rate fixed for uncomplicated amputations, report favorably on the bill, and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIAS H. HALL.

Mr. SHIVELY. My name was passed over as I could not find in the House the bill I desired to call up. I would now ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 10224) granting a pension to Elias H. Hall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Elias H. Hall, late a private in Company F, Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10224) granting a pension to Elias H. Hall, have considered the same and now report:

The claimant enlisted as a private in Company F, Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, August 11, 1862, and was honorably discharged February 1, 1863. He filed application for pension April 3, 1877, alleging that between Nashville and Gallatin, Tenn., in December, 1862, while marching by an engine some cinders got into his eyes, causing inflammation, which caused loss of sight of left eye and partial loss of sight of right eye. Subsequently he filed declaration alleging diarrhea and sunstroke.

The claim was rejected for piles, diarrhea, and sunstroke on the ground of no record. The claim as to the eye trouble was rejected on claimant's statement to special examiner that all his trouble in the service was a little cold, and the eye trouble for which the claim was undergoing special examination, says the Pension Bureau, "creates a strong presumption against the present claim." The evidence shows conclusively that the claimant's eyes were sound prior to and at the time of enlistment.

Matt Boyd, who was lieutenant of claimant's company, and was present at the time the accident occurred, testifies that "claimant got some cinders in his eye, causing loss of sight of left eye and partial loss of sight of right eye."

Regimental Surgeon Brenton testifies to treatment at that time for inflammation of eyes, and, if recollection correct, was sent to convalescent camp at Gallatin, Tenn.

Samuel Barrett, a member of claimant's company, who was with him at the time, says that—

"Some time in the month of December, 1862, near a place called Gallatin, Tenn., cinders from a locomotive blew in his eyes when in the line of duty. This I know by being with him at the time, and took a handkerchief and wiped his eyes."

Lewis Lemert, a member of said company, testifies from personal observation while in the service that "he (claimant) sustained an injury to his eyes."

There is much other testimony as to the incurrence of the disability of claimant's eyes, and as to the continuance of said disability up to the present time.

After a careful examination of the voluminous evidence in the case, we are of the opinion that the preponderance of the testimony is favorable to the claimant, and we therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. SHERIDAN.

Mr. LYNCH. In the absence of Mr. MORRILL, who reported the bill, I ask unanimous consent——

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; regular order.

Mr. LYNCH. Let me finish. To take up bill (H. R. 11113) granting a pension to Mrs. Sheridan, widow of the late General Sheridan.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

PHILLIP KOPPLIN.
